We were present at this meeting and made a full note of the speeches. These will be published later. Gordon Stott was the other speaker. Both speakers spoke forcibly. The Duke of Bedford, replying to questions, pointed out that he did not urge monetary reform as a substitute for Socialism. He did think that it was an imperative step in social change and ought to have its place as a first plank on the Socialist platform.

COMMUNISM

THE STORY OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY

JEAN VALJEAN, 18B.

All Socialists have been moved by Victor Hugo's immortal story of Jean Valjean. Have we not wept at the account of his terrible sufferings and then been raised to wrath at the fact of his yellow passport.

"See here!" said Valjean to the good bishop without waiting for him to speak. "My name is Jean Valjean. I am a convict. I have been nineteen years in the galleys. Four days ago I was set free, and started for Pontadier, which is my destination; during those four days I have walked from Toulon. To-day I have walked twelve leagues. When I reached this place this evening I went to an inn, and they sent me away because of my yellow passport, which I had shown at the Mayor's office, as was necessary. I went to another inn; they said: 'Get out.' It was the same with one as with another; nobody would have me. I went to the prison and the turnkey would not let me in."

He drew from his pocket a large sheet of yellow paper, which he unfolded. "This is my passport, yellow as you see. That is enough to have me kicked out wherever I go . . . See, here, here is what they have put in the passport: 'Jean Valjean, a liberated convict, native of——,' you don't care for that, 'has been nineteen years in the galleys; five years for burglary; fourteen years for having attempted four times to escape. This man is very dangerous.'"

The time of this incident was 1815. The yellow passport was a fact. Hugo immortalised the horror of it. The conviction and imprisonment of Jean Valjean, his treatment in the galleys, were infamies. But he was convicted, however wrongly.

Just after our last issue was published, with our plea for the release from prison of Alberto Pacitti and Gino Bertolini, they were released conditionally. Each has his identity card marked in red ink "18B," with other details. Bertolini has his employment card marked "18B" and a long screed in red about not being employed without state consent. The Aliens' Act restrictions are applied to these young men, born in Glasgow. Other ex-18B's—soldiers in the last war—have been to us, exhibiting their cards. They also are under aliens' restrictions, British born, British descent though they are, and never out of Britain except to fight for the country, as the saying says, which means its financiers and ruling class.

The 18B'ers have never been charged and so never convicted. But they are red-inked as "dangerous men"! What progress! 1815, the yellow passport! 1944, the red-inked identity card and employment card! From yellow to red—progress!

We repeat our demand for the unconditional release of Alberto Pacitti and Gino Bertolini and all ex-18B'ers.

At the present moment, these people are free. But they cannot get work. They cannot discharge their responsibilities. They cannot live. Who is going to help them? What are they to do? They are the Jean Valjeans of 1944.

LOVE'S WAY.

Judas, for silver pieces, sold
His Saviour, Master, Lord;
But we betray Him too, for gold,
And slay with bomb and sword.

How can we ever hope to find
A Heaven here below
Unless we always bear in mind
The Way His love did show?

He hung upon a cross of shame,
Dying that we might live
And on His lips no word of blame,
He'd naught but love to give.

"Father, forgive them, for" He cried
"They know not what they do!"
Was ever soul so sorely tried?
Was ever love so true?

Let us, then, try to live in peace
And stop these cruel wars,
For surely one day they will cease
If we obey God's laws.

I.L.P. "CONCHIE" MAGISTRATE

The following news item is culled from the Evening Times for Friday, May 19, 1944 :—

2 LEFT WORK EARLY: FINED

For leaving their work in a shipyard earlier than usual and thereby defrauding the firm of 1s. 3d. two men were fined one guinea each at Govan Police Court to-day, with the alternative of 14 days' imprisonment.

I understand that when men are fined for an offence such as this there is a whip-round among their workmates to pay the fine," said the Fiscal.

The fined men were William Stewart (19) of Hinshaw Street, Glasgow, and Joseph Borg (19), 78 Millbank Street, Glasgow, both apprentice sheet metal workers.

The men were seen by plain-clothes police leaving by an adjoining sewerage work. Stewart was arrested and Borg made off.

In passing sentence Bailie Myer Galpern said—"There have been quite a number of cases on similar lines before me. Is it lack of proper supervision?"

The Fiscal—The men work on different parts of a ship and proper supervision is impossible. The men are left on their honour.

Myer Galpern is a member of the I.L.P. It is quite possible that the actual offence was much exaggerated. And the men were engaged on war work. That fact explains the prosecution. Note, however, the strong capitalist-society awed tones employed by this Socialist bailie, and then see the same bailie pleading for exemption as a conscientious objector from military service.

The following report is from the Glasgow Herald for May 15, 1942—just two years before :—

GLASGOW COUNCILLOR AS OBJECTOR

Conditional Registration.

Claiming exemption from military service on moral and pacifist grounds, before a Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal in the Justiciary Buildings, Glasgow, yesterday, Councillor Myer Galpern was conditionally registered as a conscientious objector, with the provision that he should take up agricultural, forestry, or land reclamation work.

Councillor Galpern, who represents the Shettleston and Tollcross Ward in Glasgow Corporation as an I.L.P. member, declined to take the oath, explaining that he had no religion. "My objections are that I will not do anything that will assist in the prosecution of the war, but will perform work under civil control," he stated.

When asked by the chairman, Mr. J. M. Hunter, K.C., if he drank tea, he replied that he did.

Mr. Hunter—Tea is not a necessity, and do you realise that it is heavily taxed? I should have thought you would have refrained from drinking tea, as the taxation being raised at present is used for the production of munitions.

Councillor Galpern—I had never thought of that before. I will give up drinking tea.

Persons with moral objections, he said, should in no way aid the war effort. He later stated, in reply to a question by the chairman, "I regard war as a crime against humanity. There is no security based on military preparedness."

Bailie James Carmichael supported Councillor Galpern's statements, and said—"I have known him for 15 years and I think from his discussions with me privately, politically and otherwise that he holds very strong pacifist views."

Note his plea :—

Persons with moral objections, he said, should in no way aid the war effort.

If this was true on May 14, 1942, it remained true on May 19, 1944. Then what was Myer Galpern, who pledged himself to give up drinking tea because it aided the war effort—a ridiculous and whining agreement having no relation to truth—doing in presiding over a war prosecution and sending two workers to prison for not doing war-work to the last ounce of efficiency? What have James Maxton and John M'Govern to say about such conduct? What has the C.B.C.O. and the I.L.P. War Resisters to say to this Socialist C.O. turned magistrate?

Let them look at the facts. The workmates have a whip-round to pay the fine! Why? Because the fine is resented. The suggestion of defrauding the employers—as though employers never defrauded their workers, especially on time items, on occasion, and especially in big impersonal works, where there is no direct personal contact between an employer and his workers—is so much camouflage to cover the fact that this is a Ministry of Labour prosecution, and that the real issue is one of totalitarian industrial conscription.

The Glasgow. Evening Times for Wednesday, August 16, 1944, published the following news-item :—

Sheriff's Comment.

"PROSECUTIONS ARE ABSURD"

Sheriff Substitute James Macdonald, K.C., was critical of the methods of the Ministry of Labour and National Service in two cases which were called before him in Edinburgh Sheriff Court this morning.

Two mineworkers from Rosewell, Midlothian, had pleaded guilty to charges of being late for work on eight different occasions.

The accumuative time on which the charges were based were trifling, and the Sheriff said that "the prosecutions are perfectly absurd."

When asked by the Deputy Procurator Fiscal if the accused were to be admonished, the Sheriff replied: "No admonitions at all. These cases should never have been brought. I dismiss the charges."

The Evening Citizen, Glasgow, same date, published a report from which we excerpt :—

SHERIFF SPEAKS HIS MIND

When two Rosewell pitworkers came before Sheriff Macdonald at Edinburgh Sheriff Court to-day admitting having been late at their work on eight occasions, the Sheriff dismissed both accused.

"The prosecution is perfectly preposterous," said the Sheriff.

The fiscal pointed out that the prosecutions were brought by the Ministry of Labour and National Service. They wanted them prosecuted.

The Glasgow Herald for Thursday, August 17, reported the case beneath the headings :—

LATE FOR WORK

Sheriff Dismisses Two Miners

Giving the same details as the reports quoted, but mentioning that the Depute Fiscal was Mr. J. Gibson, the Herald report concludes :—

Sheriff Macdonald said, "There is no justification for these prosecutions. They were only late one or two minutes. These are ridiculous prosecutions."

Mr. Gibson pointed out that the prosecutions were brought by the Ministry of Labour and National Service. "They wanted them prosecuted," he told the Sheriff.

It is clear that Sheriff-Substitute James MacDonald, K.C., was opposed to these prosecutions. It is clear that such proseceutions are instituted by the Ministry of Labour. We do not suppose that Sheriff MacDonald is a member of the I.L.P., and we shall be surprised if he should prove to be a conscientious objector. We do not believe that he has promised not to drink tea for the duration. But he seems to be able to stand against bureaucracy and to render a more wholesome verdict in these matters of national service than the I.L.P. conchie-non-tea-drinking bailie. What contrasts in justice and what a study in lick-spittle capitalist "Socialism!"

LINK WITH LISTER.

Some time ago we published a picture of The Strickland Press building, showing that it was situate in the slums of Glasgow. Few people realise that these premises are historic and linked with the great work of Lord Lister.

"City and Clyde," in the "Evening Times," Glasgow, for Friday, September 1, 1944, published the following paragraph on the subject :—

One of the very few remaining Glasgow men who have a link with the work of Lord Lister at the Royal Infirmary is Mr. Andrew Brown who to-day celebrates his 93rd birthday.

Hospital appliances used by the famous surgeon were made by Mr. Brown, whose shop was at 104 George Street until his retiral from business in 1939.

Quite recently Mr. Brown presented to the Corporation a Lister steam carbolic spray, which can be seen at the People's Palace, Glasgow Green.

Mr. Brown was born at 3 College Street, in the same building as the poet Motherwell.

One of Mr. Brown's vivid recollections is the day on which Dr. Pritchard was executed.

He was a pupil of Hutchesons' Hospital School at the time, and so great was the crowd congregated in Jail Square that he had to make a detour through Glasgow Green.

The Strickland Press took over the George Street premises from Mr. Brown in 1939. At that time Mr. Brown had worked in the George Street shop for over seventy years.

P. J. Dollan's Court Martial.

We have published full accounts in these columns of Sir Patrick Dollan's prosecutions, appeals, and prison experiences (sic) as a conchie, during the first World War. But we have not recorded his one and only Court-Martial.

Dollan was court-martialled at Hamilton Barracks on June 2, 1917. The Tribunal, organ of the No-Conscription Fellowship—which gave such scant reporting to our court-martials, imprisonments, and prison resistance—devoted great space to Dollan's court-martial in its issue for July 5, 1917 (No. 65). But Dollan belonged to the I.L.P.!

We reproduce the report :—

DOLLAN'S "C.M."

At his court-martial, which was held at Hamilton Barracks on June 2nd, P. J. Dollan, in his statement, laid chief emphasis upon the illegality of the charge against him.

He said that, believing in social service for the common good, he accepted from the Central Tribunal exemption on condition of finding work of national importance, and was endeavouring to comply when the Committee on Work of National importance notified him that no work, however essential it might be for the public welfare, would be allowed unless it was performed at least 50 miles from his home. Such proposal was no part of the Tribunal's decision, and its legality was being contested in the High Court of Justiciary. He pointed out that the deportation of citizens had been effected under powers conferred by the D.R. Acts—not the M.S. Acts. "Apparently," he said, "the Government is more anxious that I should remove 50 miles from Glasgow than that I should take up work of national importance. Otherwise, I would have been allowed to take up one or other of the five tasks which I offered to undertake in accordance with the decision of the Central Tribunal."

He maintained that his arrest was illegal, as he was in communication with the Central Tribunal on the date of his arrest. He had been arrested, he said, not because he did not comply with the Tribunal's decision, but because he "did not recognise an unsigned edict of deportation issued by a body which has no legal authority to issue such an edict, let alone to enforce it at law.

"it is somewhat inconsistent," he continued, "that the Government which protested against the deporatation of workmen from Belgium by the German Government should itself arrest British workmen who protest against deportation here."

Not a very heroic defence : and, of course, the High Court declined to uphold Dollan's argument. But it served its purpose and saved him from much punishment. The man who protested against Defence of the Realm Acts n 1917, said not a word in 1940-44 against the suspension of habeas corpus and the right of the citizen not to be detained or interned or jailed without charge and trial. What a study! What a pretty study in Socialism and in conscience!

SEED-TIME AND HARVEST

By Councillor Charles A. Earl

As I write in early September the harvesting of corn is practically finished, and the harvesting of fruit and vegetables is under way. It is not, however, of this kind of harvest that I want to write about just now, but before I go on to my main subject I would like to emphasise one or two points. Before the outbreak of the present war the agricultural worker was more badly treated than any other worker (except perhaps the miner), he sowed but others reaped. He sweated for a bare existence and others waxed fat on his labour, he was indeed a slave. However much he resented his low wages and long hours of work, he had no remedy; indeed in many instances his very home depended on his keeping his job. He lived in a tied cottage, and his family would be without a roof over their heads if he got the sack. The workhouse is not a homelike institution. Then came the war, and suddenly the agricultural worker found himself one of the most important and essential workers of the country. He found that the King and Country at last realised that they really needed him; up to now they had taken him for granted, and so long as their food was produced they didn't care two hoots what his conditions were like; but now, unless the fighting men and women, the munition workers, to say nothing of statesmen and kings, were fed, there could be no war, so they quickly began to make a fuss of the farm labourer. He was now a great patriot, and must be looked after; his wages must be increased; his housing improved; amenities must be provided, and so on. Now the tragedy of this is, that during all the bad times, the agricultural workers themselves were not completely organised in a trade union, and workers in other trades did not, generally speaking, regard the agricultural workers' troubles as their troubles, they did not live up to the old Socialist doctrine that "the concern of one is the concern of all," In other words, they forgot they were all brothers. Has this lesson now been learned?

1914-1918 World War. 1919-20 Treaty of Versailles. League of Nations 1921-1938. Wars in South America, China, and Abyssinia. Persistent opposition to Russian progress, the Arcos incident. Constant upheavals in Europe. Deliberate refusal by Great Britain and France to implement certain clauses in Versailles Treaty. Dawes Plan. Kellogg Pact. Locarno and Munich. 1939—2nd World War. That, comrades, is a brief account of the seed-time, with its unemployment, distressed areas, and starving millions, its destroying of foodstuffs, the refusal of men and nations to co-operate. The insistence on private profit and the hateful doctrine of every man for himself. Then began the harvest resultant upon the terrible sowing. Whole nations, including our own, turned into slaves, conscription everywhere. Our freedom was certainly in peril (our Tory masters frankly and boldly advertised this fact), but we did not defend it with all our might. We listened to newspaper and wireless propaganda, we did not know how to think for ourselves. We failed to realise as workers that it was the ruling classes that had brought this war upon us. That it was again to be a gigantic struggle between imperial and capitalist interests and that the common people of all lands were to be set against one another in order to protect and preserve those interests, and we allowed our freedom to be taken away from us. I say quite emphatically that 95 per cent. of the common people, the fighting men and women, the munition workers, civil defence, home guard and others, had not the foggiest idea what the trouble was all about. Why they should be expected to kill the common people of other countries, people whom they had never seen and who could not possibly have done them any harm. No, like sheep they allowed themselves to be driven to the slaughter without understanding why. Some of us know how difficult it was, during the years between the two wars, to get people interested in the affairs of their town and country, let alone in international affairs. They could not be persuaded to attend meetings or discussion groups, they could not be persuaded, many of them, to use their votes. Consequently when trouble came they were easy prey for the propaganda put out by the ruling classes, and it was the same in all countries. The bands played, the flags waved, we sang our "Rule Britannia," our "Star Spangled Banner," our "Watch on the Rhine," our "Marsellaise," and our "Internationale," and allowed ourselves to be blinded to the fact that we should have been shouting, "Workers of the world, unite, you have nothing to lose but your lives and chains." We forgot, we workers of the world, that our interests were common interests. We forgot that the world was our country and that all men were brothers. We forgot that in between wars we profoundly distrusted the reactionary ruling classes; we forgot that for a very long time we had striven to throw them from off our backs, and so in our ignorant forgetfulness we permitted them to bind still more chains to our bodies and allowed them to compel us to give our very lives and homes, and all the things we value most, in order to preserve their vested interests.

1939-1944. The sowing during these past five years has been even more dreadful. We have seen the workers of the world busily destroying each other, blasting their homes and families. We have seen death and destruction dropped from the air by the workers on to the homes of their comrades, and it must be definitely realised that to a very great extent the ruling classes who make the wars are the ones who suffer the least. Royalty, Presidents, Dictators, and Statesmen do not live in the congested areas of the dockside or the factories. It is only the worker who is compelled to live there, and it is the worker and his home and family that gets bombed out of existence. Jack, Bob, and Tom have never met Hans, Carl, and Fritz; they have all got nice little wives and two or three kiddies, but one day their respective rulers say to them, "Go and kill each other," and for no other reason than that they proceed to their bloody work. What will the harvest be? The Atlantic charter is not to apply to our Indian and African comrades. Franco, the Spanish Civil War "hero," is commended by Churchill. Badoglio, who poisoned with gas our Abyssinian brothers, also receives the esteem of our rulers. Obsolete Kings and Queens, who in time of trouble left their peoples to shift for themselves, are to be reinstated, and private enterprise and exploitation of the workers is to be pursued with greater vigour than ever before. Atlantic Charter, White Papers, Beveridge, Uthwatt and other Reports, having served their purpose of temporarily giving the people something to distract their attention from the horrors of war, are pigeonholed, and now the common people of all lands have got to begin paying for all this wicked destruction. We have enthusiastically supported "Salute the Soldier" and other savings weeks; we have anticipated joyfully our post-war Income-tax credits; but have we stopped to realise that before we can get any interest or repayments, we have ourselves got to earn the money before it can be paid back to us? Did we fondly imagine that the Tory capitalists were going to pay us out of their ill-gotten gains? What a foolishly mistaken idea! No, the fact is that we shall be compelled not only to earn the money to repay ourselves, but also to pay the interest on the money lent by our capitalist rulers, and while we are doing this, and when all the excitement has died down, we shall recall with bitterness and sorrow the loss of dear ones, the broken bodies, the wrecked homes, and I hope we shall ask ourselves, "Why"! What has been accomplished that will make such frightful and appalling sacrifices worth while? Comrades, are you again going to allow yourselves and your children to be bamboozled and betrayed by the ruling classes. Will you now take control for yourselves and see that the New World is a world of brotherhood and not of slavery? Workers of the world, unite, you have nothing to lose, but everything to gain.

NOTES AND COMMENTS
BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Certain recent speeches in Parliament, and events elsewhere, though mostly of a discouraging nature, are of sufficient importance to call for comment.

Mr. Gallacher's ill-natured outburst in the House of Commons, protesting against Captain Ramsay's long overdue release—an outburst in which apparently he had the sympathy of Mr. Shinwell and Mr. Pritt—shows us how much we could expect in the way of freedom and justice from a Communist or near-Communist government. Mr. Gallacher, it is worth noting, did not pretend that Captain Ramsay's continued imprisonment was necessary in the interests of national security. He appeared to think that he should be kept in prison because he was anti-Semitic, although anti-Semitism has never been declared an offence punishable at law. What is so objectionable about our Communists is not their Communism but their "Fascism," i.e. their addiction to ruthless bureaucratic and Party tyranny. Communists, also, more than any other group, seem to be committed to the satanic doctrine that the end justifies the means—a doctrine which, when put into practice, always, in the long run, produces failure, strife and misery, for it is the negation of Christianity and true morality. Other parties, it is true, commonly act as though the end justifies the means, but they are apt to do so in a shamefaced manner, seeking to excuse themselves, for their consciences, though moribund, are not wholly dead. Communists, however, are at times quite blatant about doing evil that good may come and their consciences on this issue do seem to be completely dead. E. Preobrazhenski, part-author of The A.B.C. of Communism, one of Lenin's personal friends, in Morality and Class Standards, says:—

"Whereas in a society in which there are no classes lying is a disadvantage in itself because it compels the members of the society to use their energy in discovering the truth, the case is quite different in a society based on class. In the struggle of an exploited class against their enemies, lying and deceit are often very important weapons; all the subterranean work of revolutionary organisations actually depends on overreaching the power of the State. The worker's state, surrounded as it is on all sides by hostile capitalist countries, finds lying very necessary and useful in its foreign policy. Therefore, the attitude of the working class and the Communist Party to the open recognition of the right to lie is quite different from that of the Western European Socialists, those God-fearing petit bourgeois, who are systematically deceived and treated as fools by the representatives of capital . . . The lie is a consequence of the oppression of one man by another, the result of the class and group war."

From this it is evident that under existing conditions lying is openly advocated as an instrument of policy, while even in the ideal Communist state it is only discouraged because it involves a waste of time and energy and not for the really valid reason that it destroys that trust and mutual respect which are essential to a happy human fellowship ow .

Mr. Churchill's reference to the fact that a great deal of blood is going to be shed in the next few months, Liberal, Conservative and Labour blood, emphasizes, once more, the utter callousness of this peculiar old man with regard to the sufferings even of his fellow-countrymen. I must say I do not envy him the time—which in the natural course of events cannot be far distant—when at last in that Hereafter in which, presumably, he does not believe, or tries to forget, he is compelled to face up to all the misery and evil which his policy of blood and still more blood has involved.

The Times recently contained a querulous leading article quoting the appeal of the Dutch minister who anticipates grave damage to Holland as a result of destruction to dams, etc., by the German armies covering their retreat. This damage, attributed to the peculiar malignity of Germans, can, according to the Times, only be prevented by an allied advance in Holland as rapid as that in France. A better way of saving Holland, one would have thought, would have been by a negotiated peace which restored Dutch territory undamaged to the Dutch; German territory to the Germans; Polish territory to the Poles; and Latvian and Esthonian territory to the peoples of those countries; and which secured for all nations security against military attack by world disarmament made effective by adequate safeguards based on rights of inspection.

Guarded, semi-official, vague, yet insistent and obviously inspired suggestions that we ought not to be too ready to turn down the Bretton Woods proposals lest we give offence to America are sinister reminders of the subservience of British Chancellors of the Exchequer to those financial interests which, via Bretton Woods, are so busily and so obviously engaged in setting up a tyranny outside the control of law and national governments, which will needlessly restrict British trade and increase poverty and unemployment among the people of Britain and ultimately among those of America as well.

On the other hand the rather critical reception given even in the government and Finance-controlled British Press to the brutal and unstatesmanlike proposals of Morgenthau for the post-war treatment of Germany, gives rise to some rather interesting speculations as to what game the British Cabinet is really playing.

Morgenthau—the author of the notorious post-war trade "plan"—a typical Big Finance ramp—proposes to:

"1. Divide the Reich into two States—North Germany and South Germany.

"2. Cede the Saar and certain Rhineland areas to France.

"3. Give the eastern areas of Poland, in accordance with Russia's wishes.

"4. Strip German steel plants to a fraction of their present capacity.

"5. Move excess industrial facilities to France and other lands ravaged by the Germans as a kind of reparation.

"6. Dismember the chemical industry.

"7. Remove synthetic oil works entirely, because they are essential to war industry.

"8. Close ore-producing mines.

"9. Divide large estates into small farms.

"10. Supervise education.

Churchill's vanity and Eden's schoolboy mentality which envisage the occupation of Germany as valuable to the maintenance of future peace, cannot, it seems, forego the aim of unconditional surrender notwithstanding the cost in British lives and the ultimate danger elsewhere. I should judge, however, that they are not entirely happy about future relations with Russia. Morgenthau is on the safe side of the Atlantic, but British Press Lords, financiers and leading Conservatives are not.

It would not surprise me, therefore, if the government's intention, in the event of victory, is to set up in Germany, under the administration of British officials, not a Morgenthau régime, but one fairly humane and enlightened. This might contrast favourably in the German mind with the brutal severity of the régime which may be imposed in those parts of Germany occupied by the Soviet and thus prepare for the enlistment of German aid in the event of a future conflict with Russia. That future conflict and the preparations therefore are soon likely to be the major problem with which lovers of peace will have to deal.

It is a difficult problem, very likely far more difficult than the German problem need ever have been, for we are dealing with a people less like ourselves in character and psychology and with one to whom we have considerably less to offer in the way of practical aid as evidence of our goodwill. We are also dealing with a people many of whose leaders have neither forgotten nor forgiven our hostility and censure in the days before the common war interest compelled a somewhat uneasy alliance. However, as I have said in other of my recent writings, we must not allow ourselves to become despondent. I do not like much of Stalin's policy and many of his methods as I might tell him quite frankly to his face if I were ever to meet him. I do not agree with his atheism in which, as a Communist, he may take an intellectual pride, but which in point of fact is no more than a blindness to the greatest and most important of all realities, as well as one of the most obvious. On the other hand he has probably been reared in a hard school; he may seldom or never have seen true Christianity in action; he has certainly never encountered honest statesmanship; he may be capable of responding to genuine friendliness; or he may at least possess sufficient common sense to realize that even for dictators wars are becoming a risky and unpleasant business and that a world without war may be more comfortable, more durable and more secure if the grievances that led to war can be removed. Even if Stalin should prove unapproachable he may have a more amenable successor, and behind the Russian rulers are the Russian people, kindly and reasonable in most cases if given a square deal and convinced of the reality of our desire for friendship.

The Government's compulsory social insurance plan that was so enthusiastically boosted in some of the papers may be summed up as a scheme for robbing Peter to pay Paul and robbing Peter at one period of his life to hand him back his own money at another. Robbing Peter to pay Paul is a device for equalising the burden of poverty so dear to the heart of some Socialists that they can imagine nothing better. While not wholly without merit or justice, it is, however, a poor substitute for increasing wealth for all, and particularly for those who most need an increase. Robbing Peter at one period of his life by compulsory insurance payments in order to hand him back his own money at another period is nonsense. If the output and import of goods permits—as in peace-time it should—wage-earners ought to be allowed to spend their full incomes without deductions, and if, in the future, they need money to support them in age, sickness or unemployment, the money should be created and given them as, and when, required. Anti-inflation taxation, graduated so as to fall most heavily on the most wealthy, is all the robbing of Peter in Paul's interest that a sane system requires.

EDINBURGH MEETING.

The Duke of Bedford writes to say that our very short summary of his address at the Edinburgh No-Conscription Meeting is "not a very good presentation of what" he "actually did say." He adds:—

What I think I said was that, while my general attitude towards Socialism was an open-minded one, I was suspicious of bureaucracy. My approach to the problems which Socialists desire to see dealt with was from a rather different angle to the orthodox Socialist one. I considered monetary reform the essential first step. When the evils of finance had been got out of the way, it would be easier to see in their right perspective the other social evils that had to be dealt with. It would also be easier to see clearly the best way of dealing with them.

"UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER" —FOR BANKERS!

By

A. CORNELL

(Editor, "Boise Valley Herald," Idaho, U.S.A.)

Reference has been made in these columns to the "Boise Valley Herald," published in Middleton, Idaho, U.S.A. The annual subscription for this excellent weekly journal is one dollar, and we invite all our comrades and readers to secure each issue as it comes out. In its issue for July 6 and July 12, 1944, our contemporary published the speech made by the Duke of Bedford in the House of Lords on "Peace and Reconstruction" on June 2nd, 1942. In the July 6 issue, the editor, our comrade, A. Cornell, published the editorial reproduced below.—Ed.

We want to put all the emphasis at our command, on the importance of the implications of Instalment 1 of "Why Keep Blundering On?" as continued in this week's issue of this paper from last weeek. The focal point of the Duke of Bedford's address to the House of Lords is paragraph 10. Read it and ponder. A member of the British House of Lords is likely to know what he is talking about. From the people's standpoint the trouble is that rarely, indeed, do members of such high-up political circles have either the conscience or the ability or the courage to lay bare the roots of a war, right when it is going on in all of its madness, that the Duke does in this instance.

Unprecedented political conscience and courage in Lordly places however, mean not a thing unless it is matched by unprecedented conscience, courage, and forthright action on the part of the people. In our opinion, Duke of Bedford's paragraph 10 fails to adequately emphasise the part the Axis Powers' financial system is playing in determining the "secret" objectives of this war.

In the Paris Peace Conference, Lloyd George reminded President Wilson that truth is the first casualty of war. In this speech Bedford gives a most timely lead to the strategy of war promoters. The key to the success of secrecy as to the true causes and the actual objectives, as the Duke states, is to "exploit the generous"—the idealistic —"emotions of those" who are victimized by war. That phrase, "exploiting the generous emotions" of the victims of war, deserves to become classic. However that phase of war promoters is on its way out. People who will tamely submit to conscription do not have their generous emotions exploited except to get them to give moral support to the sordid and accursed thing. As a means to streamlining conscripted regimentation so as to get the moral support, devices such as Atlantic-Charter ballyhoo, aluminium drives, bond-buying drives, bandage-making drives, racial segregation schemes are some of the present-day devices. Any and every means of "exploiting" generous emotions help to the life-saving work for Mars and insures secrecy as to the actual causes and true objectives of war.

However, it so happens that in the present instance we have actual and factual exhibits that surpass anything that was available in World War 1, that prove that the secret cause and objective of this war is the threat to International Banker control of national finances that marked the success of Axis commercial competition. It is well known that Germany in particular was winning foreign markets away from the nations that were under International Banker domination. That the United States administration has been a secret enemy of a sensible money system is fully proven by the following passage from the Congressional Record:

ROOSEVELT AS A "BIG-BUSINESS" MAN

Speech of Hon. John C. Schaffer of Wisconsin in the House of Representatives, Friday, June 30, 1939, Cong. Record, p. 8463:

Mr. Speaker—The "Washington Post" of June 18th, in an Associated Press report, states that President Roosevelt has made the following statement:

"It would undermine the National Defence and return control of money to Wall Street and International Bankers if Congress refuses to continue my power to devalue the dollar." (This editor's emphasis.)

This, Mr. Speaker, is rather a remarkable statement in view of what I am prepared to tell you:—

I hold in my hand a photostatic copy of page 31 of the "New York Times" of September 14, 1922, in which appears an advertisement of a new issue of 600,000,000 German marks, floated by United European Investors Ltd., Franklin D. Roosevelt, President.

I have a photostatic copy of page 1480 of Poor's Register of Directors, 1929, wherein Franklin Delano Roosevelt is shown as director of The International Germanic Trust Co.

I have here a copy of the prospectus and photostats of other records of the Federal International Banking Corporation, indicating that Franklin D. Roosevelt wrote the foreword of the prospectus for this International Banking outfit, and was hooked up in it with Robert Rowland Appleby, president of the British Empire Chamber of Commerce in the United States. His International Banking Corporation, according to its prospectus, was organised for the selling of foreign securities and bonds to the American people.

Mr. Speaker, in view of Mr. Roosevelt's International Banking record, it is rather astounding for him to tell the Congress that it would "return control of money to Wall Street and International Bankers if it refused to continue his power to devalue the dollar."

Our New Deal President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, is an ex-International Banker of wide experience and a former attorney for International Bankers. Under his gold and silver policies the International Bankers, foreign owners of, and speculators in gold, waxed fat when Mr. Roosevelt forced Americans to turn in their gold for $20.67 an ounce or go to jail for 5 years, and then imported more than $10,000,000,000 worth of foreign gold at $35 an ounce.

Mr Speaker, President Roosevelt did not drive the money changers out of the temple of government. He drove them into the temple, with the help of his Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau—the son of Morgenthau, the International Banker—who married the favourite niece of Lehman Brothers, who are among the most powerful International Bankers in America.

It would seem that with the widespread reading and general understanding of the social analysis revealed by the "Dr. Jeckyl-and-Mr. Hyde" study of the past half-century, that the wholesale deception on the Roosevelt scale of the best-schooled generation in history, would be impossible. However the same rules of victimising, by the betrayal of the civic virtue of a nation of people, holds good that are used in betraying the moral virtue of an individual person. The rules of the strategy of deception probably were never more concisely expressed than in what is known in literature as Bishop Hall's Works, written in 1634, when he put it this way:—

"The flatterer's art is nothing but a delightful cozenage, whose rules are guarded with perjurie; whose scope is to make men (and women) fooles. . . ."

But the thing we are trying to make clear in this matter is, that a betrayer cultivates a voice and manner that is, after the fashion of betrayers, all but musical in tone, and "seductive" in its promises. The seducer's objective is hidden. It is the very opposite of his "pretensions" and his promises. It works on a nation of heedless people exactly as it works on a heedless individual—of either sex. Voltaire, that master satirist put it this way:—

"It is a question of great importance how far the people, that is nine-tenths of the human race, ought to be treated like apes. The deceiving party has never examined this question with sufficient care; and for fear of being mistaken in their calculations, they have heaped up all the visionary notions they could in the heads of the party (this same nine-tenths of the people) deceived."

Thus it is that man averages being what they are and the past record of F. D. Roosevelt, the key-man in this war, being what it is, there are 99 chances to 1 that the secret purpose behind the demand for unconditional surrender is to return the financial systems of the Axis Powers back to the control of the International money manipulators.

THE SOLDIER'S REWARD

The following case, illustrating the fate of the ex-soldier, is sent to us by Mr. Isaac Queen, President of the Bridgeton Branch of the British Legion. It tells how an East End soldier after twenty years' service is forced to live after he was discharged from the Army on medical grounds. The ex-soldier concerned is Frances O'Lone, 20 Carfield Street, Dennistoun.

At the age of 18 O'Lone joined the Scottish Rifles in June, 1925. After serving one year and nine months at home he was drafted to China. Six months later he went to India, where he served under trying climatic conditions, for two years. He left India and went to Egypt. The following year he returned to India and remained there until his transfer to the Army Reserve came through in 1933. During his period abroad he was interested in sports and was rated a keen sportsman and footballer.

During his reserve period he was mostly employed in the building trade and never had any need to attend a doctor.

In 1937 he was called for medical examination and passed in splendid health. In September, 1939, he was recalled for service, and following another examination was passed as being in perfect health. He was transferred to the Seaforths and went to France with that unit at the beginning of 1940. He remained there until the evacuation of Dunkirk six months. For a time he was stationed in Northern Ireland and England, undergoing a course of heavy training.

In 1942 he was sent to Madagascar. Three months later he was ordered to India. He was shipped to Persia a few months later and served five months before being sent to the Middle East.

While he was in the Middle East his legs began to trouble him. He was admitted to hospital where he stayed for eight months, all the time his legs growing steadily worse until both legs became affected. The doctors reported that they could never make him fit for the line again so he was sent home.

On arrival in this country O'Lane was sent to hospital. After four months the Doctors told him that they could not cure his trouble, progressive muscular atrophy, and that he would gradually get worse. This has become a fact, as his arms are now affected.

Two days before he left hospital, O'Lane was discharged. This was on August 22, 1944.

On being sent back to civilian life, the Army Board agreed to grant him an 80 per cent. pension. Then the Ministry of Pensions sent for him. They made him an outdoor patient of the Royal Infirmary and granted him 100 per cent. pension while under treatment. A few days later he received a letter from the Ministry of Pensions stating that he could have developed his trouble whether he had been in the army or not so they rejected his case.

This disabled soldier at present receives £1 per week unemployment benefit money which is his only source of income. He is in lodgings and finds it well nigh impossible to make ends meet.

Before his discharge he was promised that he would be helped to find a light job suitable for him. He has not got one yet. Every day his condition is getting worse. Very soon he will find it impossible to discharge the duties of even a light job. What can be done?

IN A SLUM KITCHEN.

He kept preaching Socialism to me,
Thin, half-naked man, in a slum kitchen,
A room that was cold and bare.
His eyes were passionately lit
With the vision of his new world,
The Utopia of freedom.
Freedom from poverty and sloth,
Freedom from hopelessness and despair,
Freedom from slavery and oppression,
Freedom from everything that made men brutes.
His voice was like a trumpet call
From the melting rocks of Hell.
But while he spoke, my eyes
Were fixed upon a little cage
That hung above the window.
In it was a bird,
A tiny soul of feathered-gold,
Beating its frail wings against its prison bars
And calling, but upon deaf ears,
For an open door, and freedom.

WAR AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

THE BEDFORD TRADITION

Speeches delivered in the House of Lords, by Francis, Fifth Duke of Bedford, during the war with revolutionary France, respecting the need for peace and the struggle for civil liberty in time of war.

(Culled from the Official Parliamentary Reports.)

Extract from speech delivered in the debate on the Address of Thanks, December 30, 1794 :—

THE CASE FOR PEACE NEGOTIATIONS

All that had been said about the difficulty of treating, he conceived to be nothing more than pretence. It was every way as easy to negotiate with France as with any other state. That country, notwithstanding all its recent convulsions, did not seem more incident to a change in it's rulers than it's neighbours. The ministry of none could be permanent and there was an end of all treaties, if that was to be a condition which could never happen. But what did nations chiefly regard as the mutual basis of confidence in their conditions? Not surely the precarious circumstances of vicissitude in cabinets, the intrigues of courtiers or the narrow and crooked politics of favourite statesmen; but the prevailing temper and genius of the people. And he did not expect to be now told that though Tallien and his friends were to perish to-morrow, the French would be at any loss for leaders. There was nothing in the Speech that in the smallest measure determined what the object of the war really was, or at what stage of it, any hopes were to be indulged in of peace.

Had ministers shown to his conviction that they aimed at nothing unjust or unreasonable, he would have been the last man in the House to oppose it; but when called to support a war of mutual destruction, and of which he saw no end, he had no option but to grapple for his own safety as well and as long as he could, and that, he was decidedly convinced, was only to be obtained by the means recommended in the amendment. . . .

The noble secretary had said that we ought to follow up with vigour the generous exertions of war in which the country was engaged. He was at a loss to construe this odd phraseology. It was an easy matter for ministers and statesmen to devise at their leisure the means of supporting what they were pleased to call "generous exertions," not with their own but with the riches and blood of a gallant and unsuspecting public. They knew nothing of the distresses it occasioned among those who immediately felt its pressure, of being violently torn from their families or of leaving them destitute and miserable, and of having all the hardships of a military life imposed upon them instead of the quiet domestic habits in which they were born and bred.

To these direful extremities thousands of their fellow-creatures were daily consigned by their order. They prescribed the duty, but others must set the example. All the difficulty or inconvenience that fell upon them, was to bring forward a plausible case for public inspection. But was not this being generous at the expense of others? He would venture to assure them that, for such generous exertions as these, they would not have the blessing of the widow or the fatherless, the approbation of their own hearts, or that of any thinking, sober, or good mind.

Extract from speech in the debate on the Earl of Guildford's motion for a Committee on the State of the Nation, March 30, 1795 :—

THE CONDUCT OF MINISTERS

The Duke of Bedford said that if there had not been error in the principles upon which the war was entered into, there must have been want of ability in the mode of conducting it. It was the duty of that House to discover the source of so many miscarriages, to teach ministers to act better if they had been in error, or if they were wilfully perverse and incapable to address his majesty for their removal. . . .

Even the friends of ministers ought to vote for the inquiry, as the surest and most dignified mode of wiping away the imputations upon their conduct, and giving confidence to the public in their future operations.

If there were discontents at home; if there were such seeds of disaffection as had been made the pretext for suspending one of the most essential guards of the liberty of the subject, an honest inquiry into the cause of our disasters was the most effectual means of crushing them. Let their lordships prove that they were alive to the interests and feelings of the people, and they would exert a much stronger engine for securing internal peace than axes or scaffolds. It was impossible for them, in justice, in equity or in prudence to reject the motion of his noble friend.

Extract from a speech on the Treasonable Practices Bill, November 6, 1795 :—

IN DEFENCE OF CIVIL LIBERTIES.

The Duke of Bedford said that on the first part of the Bill there could be no difference of opinion as far as it related to the flagitious outrage committed against the sovereign; every man must reprobate such crimes and earnestly wish to see them punished in an exemplary manner; at the same time he saw nothing in the Bill that tended to secure or protect His Majesty's person more than what the existing laws provided for.

The second part of the Bill was founded upon the proclamation against certain meetings. Now, he would submit to the blame, whether it was not inconsistent with their dignity to proceed to so solemn an act as the introduction of this extraordinary Bill, without having before them proof of any sort that the proceedings of those meetings had rendered such a strong measure necessary. When the same minister had thought it proper to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, they did not dare to propose it without previously appointing a select committee who reported to the House a mass of evidence which gave their proceedings at least an appearance of deliberation; whereas in the present instance they seemed to disregard all idea of deliberation, inquiry or evidence, and merely because an abominable outrage had been committed on the first day of the session they were to be satisfied that such dangerous consequences were likely to follow, as nothing but this strongest of all measures could possibly prevent. It was not enough that the noble Lord should declare that he was satisfied on this point. Parliament ought to know the necessity of the Measure before they adopted it.

He wished the noble Lord would explain in what respect the existing law, as far as it regarded the King's life was defective, or wherein this Bill was likely to amend it. He never thought that the noble Lord would have so far forgotten what the nation owed to those who brought about the revolution, as to speak of the reigns of Elizabeth and Charles II as models for example. The noble Lord ought to reflect on the events that followed those precedents. In Queen Elizabeth's time these laws were chiefly directed against bulls issued by the Pope, and when the country was in a very distracted state, both from foreign and domestic foes; and in Charles the Second's reign, these measures were adopted when he was just restored after a 20 years' absence, and when such laws might be absolutely necessary for his protection. But how could a comparison be drawn between such times and the present? Even allowing that some Bill was necessary for the greater protection of his majesty, there was nothing in this Bill that could tend to that purpose. If it was a Bill fit to be passed at all for that object, it ought to be a permanent one.

Excerpts from a speech delivered May 30, 1797 :—

THE DOMESTIC CALAMITIES RESULTING FROM WAR

No man will deny the unexampled extent of our calamities. In tracing the picture of our situation for the last four years, the period to which I intend to limit my observations, there can be little new to which to call your lordship's attention. It is a beaten track which presents little variety to the view, except some new calamity and some fresh misfortune. But we ought not to be deterred by this disagreeable prospect. It is our duty to exert ourselves to remove the causes of these calamaties which we suffer and to avert those dangers which we apprehend.

The war is the first point to which I call the attention of your lordships as the great source of our present calamities.

It has been said that this war was undertaken for the preservation of law, religion and morality,—a war in defence of our liberty, our constitution, our property.

What is the state of property now? Has it been meliorated? What are the benefits which we have derived from the war? . . .

While you embarked in a contest to defend your laws against a foreign enemy, perhaps it would have been as well to have secured them against administration at home.

Are your laws ameliorated by the war? On the contrary have not your dearest privileges been suspended? Have not the laws been made against that very liberty which you went to war to defend.

It has been said that we went to war for the preservation of religion. Did you expect to defend the altar by surrounding it with seas of blood? or to secure it from violation by piling round it the carcases of the dead?

We have been told that we were fighting in support of morality. Has the war then produced many examples favourable to morality? Has the conduct of the King of Prussia furnished examples of morality? Do you find it in the dungeons of Olmutz, or in the conduct of those petty tyrants who buzzed about you when there were any hopes of success and disappeared when your cause was desperate? . . .

I come now to consider the internal state of the country. The laws which have been passed on pretence of preserving internal tranquility will afford an additional proof of the pernicious system on which ministers have acted; laws which I hold to be disgraceful to a free government, repugnant to the Constitution, and inconsistent with the principles of the Revolution.

Lord Sidney called the Duke to order and protested that such language ought not to be applied to laws which stood upon the Statute Book.

The Duke replied that the whole system of the war administration had been incompatible with good government. He turned to the situation in Ireland and denounced the conduct of Ministers in relation to Ireland.

Extract from speech supporting the Earl of Suffolk's motion for the dismissal of Pitt, March 27, 1797 :—

MINISTERS AND WAR

The Duke of Bedford said he would support the necessity of a change of system in spite of the calumnies which he knew would incur. It was his object to chase corruption from senates and despotic principles from the council of kings.

The danger of French principles was held out. But, good God! was it the way to guard against French principles to ruin our own country?

It had often been said that ministers had no interest in continuing the war. It might as well be said that it never was the interest of individuals to commit errors. Ministers might feel an individual interest in continuing that system with which their power was connected.

The powerful speech of Francis, Fifth Duke of Bedford, respecting Peace with France, made in the House of Lords, on January 27, 1795, was reproduced in these columns for July 1944. We propose to reprint the official reports of his bold and uncompromising attack on the Seditious Meetings Bill, on December 14, 1795; and his powerful speech, demanding the removal of War Ministers and the end of war, on March 21, 1798. These speeches ought to be read and circulated widely to-day.

In our September issue we referred to the manifesto signed by Francis, protesting against the war-time suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. Four other peers signed with him. They were the Earls of Albermarle, Derby, Lauderdale, and Stanhope.

J'ACCUSE

Being a letter addressed to the President of the United States denouncing the treatment of conscientious objectors and exposing the conditions prevailing at Springfield, Missouri.

Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt,
President of the United States,
White House. Washington, D.C.

New York, August 4, 1944.

Dear Sir,—I want to call your attention to a terror that is going on in the United States, which concerns conscientious objectors to conscription and war primarily, but which should be the concern of every freedom-loving individual in this country. It is about time that you became aware that it exists, and it is the purpose of this letter to enlighten you. The charges it contains are very serious, and I think, it all fairness to everyone concerned, it deserves your personal consideration and a reply.

I was a conscientious objector in World War I., and I received a twenty years' sentence for holding such convictions, which sentence was finally reduced to eighteen months, every day of which I served in prison. There were as many as 300 objectors in prison at one time, which, considering our traditional respect for conscience, was a blot and stigma against our traditions. To avoid a similar atrocity during your administration, and to prevent the imprisohnment of men for their convictions, legislation was passed seeking to exempt such men from military service. Where there were 300 men in prison in World War I., there are 3000 men in prison for the same offence to-day, or ten times as many. Which proves that our attempt to avoid this scandal has failed, and it should be the business of every man in a position of power to correct this mistake and work to have every conscientious objector freed.

Congress, in seeking to exempt conscientious objectors from military service, hardly did so with the bitterness and vindictiveness against them that some judges and prison officials have shown by their share in the imprisonment of these 3000 conscientious objectors. These 3000 men are not criminals, and when prison officials seize upon them as if they must be reformed and rehabilitated as the worst of offenders, they not only give the lie to their pretensions for the concern of their prisoners, but they show a wanton disregard for human personality that should brand them as unfit to handle any of the unfortunates in our prisons. At the present time, there is a three-cornered correspondence going on among Senator Robert F. Wagner, who indicates he is anxious to be enlightened about the present treatment of conscientious objectors in prison, and Mr. James V. Bennett, who wishes to treat them as criminals, and Mr. Alexander M. Man, of Hollis, New York, and his brother, Albon B. Man, who is serving a sentence as a conscientious objector at the Lewisburg (Pa.) Penitentiary, and other members of his family who are demanding a redress of grievances. The entire matter is one that will show the Prison Bureau as unreliable and anxious to paint honest young men with convictions as criminal and obdurate.

The immediate subject of this three-cornered correspondence is the power of the Federal Parole Board and the abuse of that power. I have before me a letter from the Parole Board addressed to a mother of a conscientious objector, which is an answer from the Board to her concern for her son Mathew Karl Amberg, now serving a three years' sentence at the Danbury (Conn.) Correctional Institution. I am attaching a copy of that letter for your edification. No autocrat could concoct a more vicious dodge to justify bureaucratic irresponsibility. How anyone can expect justice from men capable of such letters, I would like to know.

But the abuses do not end there. Among the glorious Federal prison system, you have at Springfield, Mo., a Federal Prisons Hospital and Insane Asylum to which some conscientious objectors have been sent in defiance of all the legal safeguards against such treatment that our civilisation has erected. These men are sound physically and mentally and do not belong in a madhouse. Three of these conscientious objectors—Stanley Murphy, Louis Taylor, and John J. Hewelcke—have been instrumental in proving that they were not sent to Sprinfield for their health but that their transfer to this place was purely punitive. Evidence has been coming out of Springfield, backed up by numerous affidavits, that men have been sent there to be crushed in mind and body and even to be done to death by cruel and unusual punishments. Two investigations by the officials accused in these atrocities have resulted in white-washes, because the accused acted as judges, and the victims were brow-beaten. Affidavits continue to pile up. These accusations have been sent to the Federal Public Health Service, one of the Bureaus in charge of that place, to Mr. James V. Bennett, and to Mr. Francis Biddle reminding these various people that the accusations are well-founded and deserve an impartial investigation. To no avail. The same accusations and affidavits are in the possession of the Scripps-Howard newspapers, and especially the New York "World-Telegram," which gave some space and publicity to the crimes I mention here. We ignore this scandal at great peril to our liberties. A Congressional investigation would more than substantiate these charges of cruelty, and such an impartial investigation should be demanded.

Obviously, this method of terrorising our prison population is calculated to terrorise all the citizens of this country. Before the outbreak of the war in Europe, travellers on the Continent noticed that the one thing all totalitarian countries had in common was rule by terror. This terror was carried on by mass liquidations, concentration camps, and possibly by places such as Springfield, Mo. The terror this government is encouraging by maintaining this infamy at Springfield, Mo., tars us with the same brush.

You will notice that throughout this letter I have deliberately used the personal attitude towards conscientious objectors as a measure of a person's democratic and humanitarian professions. No nation is civilised or democratic that imprisons its citizens for their convictions or that maintains madhouses for dissenters.

In World War I., whatever prison abuses the conscientious objectors brought to light, they were corrected by the administration. Thus far under your administration all prison abuses have continued in spite of the publicity they have received. That is no compliment to the present administration. I have a vital interest in this matter of freedom for conscientious objectors, not only out of regard for civic decency, but my brother, Albert Eichel, is a conscientious objector and is serving a three years' sentence at the Lewisburg (Pa.) Penitentiary, and in all decency he should be free. I am also vitally concerned about all conscientious objectors in our prisons, and I keep in constant touch with many of the families and friends of the men in prison.

I want to thank you for any consideration you will give this letter.—Yours for liberty, (Signed) JULIUS EICHEL.

COPY OF LETTER FROM PAROLE BOARD.

Members:
Arthur D. Wood, Chairman.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
United States Board of Parole, Washington 25.
June 9, 1944.

Mrs. Anna Amberg-Kofsky,
2830 Olinville Avenue,
Bronx 67, New York.

Dear Madam:

In re: Mathew Karl Amberg,
Register No. 2304-CT,
Danbury, Connecticut.
Crime: Failure to report for army induction.
Term: Three years.

This will acknowledge receipt of your letters of May 31, 1944, addressed to the members of the Board, in connection with the case of your son, the above-named.

In practically every denied case there are multiple reasons why persons are not considered favourable parole prospects. Even ascribing the principal reason is difficult. In any case that might be selected for study, it would be statistically untenable to ascribe one reason for denying parole because an individual and his background and potentialities are not so simply classifiable. Usually a constellation of circumstances leads to a denial of parole in each case.

Respectfully,
(Signed) ARTHUR D. WOOD,
Chairman.

AYR MEETING

The Ayrshire Post for October 6, beneath the heading "Fundamental Problems," reports, at length, the meeting addressed by the Duke of Bedford, in the Wallacetown South Church Hall, Ayr, on Friday evening, September 29, under the auspices of the Ayrshire Branch of the Fellowship of Reconciliation. The Rev. D. C. Mitchell, Kilmarnock, presided.

The chairman declared that the Church alone could not produce a Christian peace in the world; they had to find a broader basis for the peace treaty.

From the very full account of the Duke's speech we are able to publish a small part.

The Duke described the spread of un-Christian totalitarian philosophy which subordinated the individual to the State, and visioned the growth of State tyranny in all countries at the end of the war. He discussed Russia and the Polish question, the sanctity of international pledges, the question of appeasing Stalin, and foresaw a possible re-arming, in the future, of Germany and Japan against a mightily armed Russia.

We turn to the Post report:—

With the possible exception of demanding extravagant war indemnities, the Duke forecast that all the major blunders of the Treaty of Versailles would be repeated on an even larger scale. The Communist Government in Poland would demand a slice of German territory, and the Japanese would be driven back to starve in their rocky and barren islands, and there would be no satisfaction of their legitimate economic needs. The fundamental problem of the "have-not" nations and the "haves" was to be left unsolved, and the international financiers were to re-establish their tyranny of artificial poverty in the midst of plenty.

It was extremely likely that after the war, when the pro-Soviet propaganda died down the Russian Government would be guilty of acts of tyranny and aggression against smaller countries. Over here the people would become indignant against Russia, and probably the press and propaganda would incite them to this end. Imperialist elements in Britain would become fearful of Russia's strength and would want to arm against it, and then financial interests in Britain and America would clash with Russia probably over the question of oil. They would encourage armaments against Russia as formerly they encouraged armaments against the Axis powers.

TOTAL DISARMAMENT.

There was need for total world disarmament, he contended, because any intelligent person could see that if mankind did not destroy armaments, armaments would destroy mankind. Given the right leadership, the countries that had experienced all the bitterness and agonies of modern warfare, would give adequate support to make future wars impossible. Any authority that Britain would be able to achieve after the war would be authority on the moral plane, and it would mean that we would have to set our house in order in a way that we had never done before.

Many questions were forthcoming at the close.

Replying to one as to whether it would be possible to negotiate with Hitler or his government, the Duke said the question of trusting an individual or a particular government was, without exaggeration, pure bunk, and especially was that so at the present moment, for if they looked at recent history they saw that no statesman was really trustworthy.

Answering a further question, enlarging on this issue, and indicting the Nazi leaders for their pogroms, murders, and cruelties, the speaker indicated that Stalin had also committed atrocities and he was to be one of the makers of peace. The statesmen in all countries at the present time were a pretty dirty crowd, and if they had complete control would be untrustworthy. The mistake the questioner made was to under-estimate the tremendous impelling power of the war lesson that the people of Germany had had. With regard to the danger of reorganising, he should certainly make, as part of the peace terms, a plan for universal world

GUY A. ALDRED in the Dock at Bow Street Police Court, Thursday, August 26th, 1909.

The photograph of the Dock scene published in the "Daily Mirror" was published in these columns for September 1940, with full accounts of the 1909 trial.

[We have been asked to supply details of our views and struggle for publication in three American propaganda magazines. Since Europe is about to enter on another post-war epoch, and a new phase of the social struggle, it might not be out of place to publish the following record of heresy and protest in these columns. The story is unknown to many of our readers, most of whom belong to a generation not familiar with the events of the last war and the subsequent hunger-marching and free speech fight days.
The account is revised, and brought up to date, from an article published in "The Spur" for November, 1920. The original essay was not from our pen. We have preserved the third-person, as being the most useful form of record.—Ed.]

Surely nothing is more pleasant than, when some name crosses one, to go and get acquainted with the owner of that name.—Edward Fitzgerald, "Letters," April 1838.

Guy Aldred celebrates his fifty-eighth birthday on the fifth of November—Guy Fawke's Day, for ever famous as the date of the attempted destruction of the Houses of Parliament!

Aldred made his first appearance on the public platform on November 10th, 1902, when he preached a Christian sermon from the text: "Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ." A month later he became acquainted with Charles Voysey, of the Theistic Church, and was converted to Theism. He became a Theistic Missioner and conducted enthusiastic meetings in Clerkenwell from April to September, 1904. He then turned his mission into a Freethought one and adopted the motto of Richard Carlile: "Man has no immortal soul. The mortal soul of man is the only intelligent lord of matter."

Whilst maintaining his Atheism, Aldred has retained his original view of Jesus of Nazareth, as an outstanding teacher and pioneer of truth and a new social order based on liberty and social affection. This thesis runs through all his propaganda.

From November, 1904, to November, 1906, Aldred was the colleague of W. Stewart Ross—"Saladin"—on the Agnostic Journal, to which he contributed several biographical studies and many polemical essays.

Whilst still a Theist, Aldred became connected with the Peel Institute, joined its adult school, and developed Radical political views. Here he entered into close association with G. M. Gillett, who afterwards became Sir George Gillett.

Gillett died on August 10, 1939, at his home, Wainstones, Letchworth, Herts., aged 69. His career was a study in the progressive value of philanthropy to the philanthropist and in its failure to benetfi those whose sufferings inspire him.

In 1900, Gillett, a Quaker, commenced his social and religious activity in Clerkenwell and founded the Peel Institute. He became a member of the Borough Council, and, in 1910, of the L.C.C. He was at one time deputy chairman of the L.C.C. His membership of the County Council lasted twenty years.

Leaving the Liberals, and joining the Labour Party, he became Labour M.P for Central Finsbury, 1923-31. A banker, he followed the Ramsay MacDonald ramp, and sat as National Labour member until 1935. From 1929 to 1931, he was secretary of the Department of Overseas Trade. That year he became Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Labour. In November 1936 he was appointed Commissioner for the Special Areas in England and Wales. He resigned in May 1939. In April 1937, he spent an evening with King George, discussing plans for the relief of the poor living in the worst areas.

A pretty evolution from the Peel Institute days. So far as the poor and their poverty were concerned, a worthless evolution. It mattered to Gillett and made him feel respectable and comfortable.

Because he foresaw some such useless careerist evolution Aldred opposed the political activity of the Peel Institute.

Aldred grew dissatisfied with liberal-labourism and joined the Social Democratic Federation. This was in March, 1905. He became active on the Social Democratic platform and in its press, and acted as parliamentary correspondent to Justice.

In May, 1906, he fell foul of the Labour Party for its inaction in Parliament, and declined to write further parliamentary gossip on the ground that Parliament has ceased to interest him. He denounced the Labour M.P.'s in the columns of Justice and stated that Socialist propaganda, making for class consciousness and the social revolution, was the only hope of the working class. From this time on his membership of the S.D.F. became a stormy one, and he resigned from it in October of the same year, to devote himself to free lance propaganda.

One of the points on which Guy Aldred fell foul of the S.D.F. during his membership was the question of religion. He declared that Socialism, as a personal philosophy, involved materialism and atheism — an attitude which drew forth a defence from Belfort Bax and an edtorial denunciation in Justice from Harry Quelch for atheistic bigotry. The Rev. E. J. B. Kirtlan, a Wesleyan Socialist, openly rejoiced at Quelch's attack, and declared, with charming naivete, that on the Socialist platform he would speak for Socialism, but off that platform he would do his duty!

Aldred maintained that a man had a perfect right to expound Socialism as a Christian, but no right to prevent an atheist from speaking in atheistic terms.

The Freethought Socialist agitation that Aldred conducted in Clerkenwell down to 1907 drew enormous crowds and gave rise to a huge correspondence in the columns of the Islington Daily Gazette. An attempt was made to raise a fund to prosecute him for blasphemy, but it fell through owing to the success of his meetings, and the local support that rallied to him. These "Freethought Gospel Meetings" led G. L. Mackenzie to publish in the Islington Gazette for August 2nd, 1906, a poem in his defence, entitled "Is there a God?"

If God there be who is the first cause absolute
Then everywhere and everything this God must be:
That is—and surely, it is far beyond dispute—
If He be all, there nothing is that is not He.
How could the "all in all" beyond himself step out,
Or shrink to less than His Great Self Infinity?
If we be made by God, we are, beyond all doubt,
But part of Him—there is no we, but only He.
Our work must all be God's, if we, ourselves, be His.
For, if we "live in Him," 'tis He who works, not we.
For work of God's own work, all God's work truly is:
First cause for last effect, responsible must be.
Our deeds must therefore be all holy, good and just.
If we and they be part of God's infinity:

But many of our deeds are bad, we therefore must,
As thinking men, conclude that God there cannot be.
If cause must have effect which is in turn a cause,
And each result had cause which was a past effect,
The mighty march ne'er had, nor will have start, nor pause;

No past nor future gulf. First cause nor last effect.

By December, 1906, Aldred took his stand against all revisionism and stood for what he termed clear-cut impossiblism, i.e., a definite programme of unconditional struggle for Socialism. He endeavoured to bring about a union of revolutionary Socialists on the basis of "revolutionary parliamentarianism" that became so popular in 1920, because dictated by Moscow. The Communist Party that pretended to this programme never meant it, however. It was merely an opportunist pretence. Aldred met with no support from the learned Marxists and parliamentarians who were then enamoured with the German Social Democracy and its voting prowess! On the 28th of this month—that is nearly fourteen years before the Moscow theses captivated British latter-day Communists—Aldred published in the columns of the Islington Daily Gazette the election address which is reproduced in Dogmas Discarded, part II, chapter XV, under the caption, "Revolutionary Parliamentarianism." This is an uncompromising statement of the Socialist challenge to capitalist society.

Soon after issuing this manifesto he came to the conclusion that it was absurd for a revolutionary to want to enter the capitalist parliament and associated with the Anarchists and anti-parliamentary Communists. He became a contributor to Freedom and the Anarchist weekly, The Voice of Labour, and spoke on the anarchist platform all over London. He visited Liverpool as an anarchist missionary. This was in August 1907. Here he was the guest of Matt Kavanagh whose tireless activity made the mission a great success. Later Kavanagh moved to Southend and now lives in London. Despite his age, Kavanagh remains active in the cause and has never lost his faith.

From the beginning of his association, Aldred quarrelled with the Anarchists because of his opposition to Kropotkin. Aldred aimed to reconcile the teachings of Bakunin and Marx. He endeavoured to establish an Industrial Union of Direct Actionists, to bring about the Communist Revolution, through group organisation on the industrial field. He founded The Communist Propaganda Group, as an anti-parliamentary organisation, and defined its principles in detail two years later in his pamphlet on Militarism and Revolution. This pamphlet was embodied in At Grips With War (1929). There were twenty-one principles, the most important of which (13, 14, 15, 16, 17) are reproduced in Communism (1943), p. 122.

It makes interesting historical reading to recall these principles and study them in connection with pseudo-Communist Party propaganda that was spread abroad in Britain and America especially in 1920-21. It is strange that folk had to go to Moscow to develop views that could be developed quite naturally in Britain without the need for foreign travel.

How many of the persons who were so busy seeking recognition from Moscow in 1920-21, and posing as Britain's "leading" or "most revolutionary" Communists, ridiculed this program or ignored it when Aldred propounded it in 1906? How many of them were preaching parliamentary action down to as late as 1917, until the utter failure of German Social Democracy and the seeming triumph of Sovietism compelled them to change their avowed opinions in order to retain their political standing? Our file-cuttings could throw an interesting light on the suddenness and reason of these conversions. The fact remains that Aldred anticipated the formation of an International Communist Party, and defined its program. Proletarian experience proved that no essential departure could be made from this program without harm to the cause. History recalls, also, how the Communist Party and its International not only departed from the program but rejoiced in betraying the cause. Soviet Russia has become the home of European oppression and counter-revolution.

Much was made for some years by the "Communists," during their Labour organisation wrecking days, of Lenin's repudiation of Social Democracy and his insistence on Marxism involving revolutionary social action.

Early in 1908, Aldred proclaimed this view, in the Labour press, and in his "Pamphlets for the Proletarian," when he asked the question: "Was Marx an Anarchist?" calling it "A Question for Socialists to Answer." He was not able to return to this question again until September 1911, when he began his series of Marx articles in the Herald of Revolt. In these essays, he reviewed the contentions of the Communist Manifesto, Revolution and Counter Revolution, The Poverty of Philosophy, The Eighteenth Brumaire, and The Civil War in France, and showed that Marx, despite his later opportunism and love of power complex, did not believe in parliamentary action, denied that Parliament controlled the Armed Forces, and opposed the capture of the ready-made State machinery. "Leading British Marxists" were taking their instructions from Berlin and repudiated these statements as slanders! Immediately after the Bolshevik Revolution, these same Marxists took their instructions from Moscow and endorsed these conclusions they once so vehemently denied!

In August, 1909, Guy Aldred published the Indian Sociologist, after its first English printer had been imprisoned, in defence of the Free Press. He was charged, in consequence, with publishing "a certain scandalous and seditious libel in the form of a printed publication." He conducted his own defence and refused to apologise. At that time, the Socialist movement was indifferent to India and opposed to the Indian movement. Hyndman objected that Aldred had not consulted him and Justice denounced Aldred's "vanity." Another paper considered the prosecution "a private affair" between Aldred and the Government! Since 1921, owing to the Sinn Fein movement in Ireland, the Socialists have adopted a different attitude.

There were many simple-minded persons at this time who thought that such a powerful government as that of Britain would not stoop to employ spies and detectives nor resort to bribery to obtain its ends. That they were labouring under a delusion on this point was proven by the evidence tendered by the official detectives at this trial, as well as in the case of Horsley, the former printer. Nothing reveals better the deception practised by the secret agents of the British Government than the following uncontradicted statement of Horsley:

> "I received a visit from a detective officer from the special service department at Scotland Yard. . . . I asked the detective whether there was any reason why I should not print it ("The Indian Sociologist"). He replied, 'None whatever.'"

In spite of this official assurance he was punished with imprisonment.

It fell to the lot of Aldred to question with indignation one of the detectives cited as witnesses against him:

> "If it be a publication of a seditious character and you could not obtain a copy other than by the means you employed don't you think you were inciting me to do that which was against the law of the land?"

Aldred's speech from the dock at the Old Bailey on Friday, September 10th, 1909, was published in The Word for September 1940, as was the official legal report of the trial. One passage is worth requoting as being a declaration of faith:

> "I have no apology to make either for my attitude towards Krishnavarma, or for what I have written with reference to the Indian Question. I claim the absolute freedom of the Press, the absolute right to publish what I like, when I like, where I like. The only condition on which I can secure that right as a proletarian thinker is that I shall secure it for the Indian Nationalist Patriot, Krishnavarma. I can only do that by maintaining, at the price of my own liberty, the freedom of the Indian Nationalist Press, even where I may not agree with its principles."

On being found guilty, Aldred stated that he wanted no mitigation of sentence. The judge told him he was "young, vain, and foolish," and sentenced him to twelve months' imprisonment in the first division.

During Aldred's imprisonment, the late Sir Walter Strickland, Bt., B.A., wrote to him, and congratulated him on his stand in defence of the freedom of the press and justice for the Indian people. This commenced the propaganda association and intimacy that was ended only by Strickland's death in 1938. This association is detailed in Strickland's This March of Homicide (1942). It led to the Bakunin Press (founded in 1906) becoming the Strickland Press (1939).

Aldred was released from Brixton Prison, where he served his sentence, on July 2, 1910. Five months later he founded the Herald of Revolt as "An Organ of the Coming Social Revolution." This paper continued to appear down to May 1914, when it was closed down in favour of The Spur, which commenced publication the following month. This paper closed down in April 1921, following the raid on the Bakunin Press in London and Glasgow, and the Glasgow trial for sedition of Aldred, Jane H. Patrick, M'Leish, and Fleming. Aldred was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment, and kept in prison four months without trial, making 16 months' imprisonment in all. Jenny Patrick and the other comrades received three months' imprisonment each. This trial is recorded fully in The Word for November 1941-March 1942.

A strange consequence of the Indian Sedition trial was the attempt of the Crown to link Aldred with the libel on King George V.

On February 1, 1911, the sensational charge of publishing a libel affecting the honour of His Majesty, King George V, came before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury in the Kings Bench Division of the High Court. The case appeared in the official list as The King v E. F. Mylius. The libel forming the basis of this complaint appeared in The Liberator, published by Edward Holton James, and described as "an International Journal devoted to the Extension of the Republic." The trial was interesting as showing how lawyers connived, quite unnecessarily, at the corruption of legal procedure designed to protect the right of the citizen.

The legal doctrine advanced by Sir Rufus Isaacs for the Crown and accepted by the Chief Justice in the Mylius case was more infamous than the libel that formed the basis of the prosecution. Publication cured the libel. There was no cure for the legal doctrine, falsely and mischievously asserted in open court by the conspiracy of bar and bench. Since then, under cover of moral honour, innovations ending in the final outrage of 18B have continued to be arranged by lawyers, judges, crown and the executive.

From the report that appeared in the London Star, the following paragraphs are appropriate to this sketch.

> Sir Rufus Isaacs . . . made the interesting point that the present case was one of ordinary, not of seditious libel, and consequently the defendant had the right to plead justification, and to attempt to prove the truth of the statements complained of—a privilege not available when the charge is that of seditious libel.
> Sir Rufus further mentioned that the law officers of the Crown had decided that a constitutional disability attached to a monarch, preventing him from giving evidence in his courts; so that King George could not be called as a witness.

The libel was indefensible but not more so than this statement of law by Sir Rufus Isaacs, later to become Lord Reading.

The Crown authorities and the Court knew that Mylius could not plead justification. And the very constitutional disability, if it existed, that prevented the Monarch from giving evidence in his own courts, clearly made it impossible for him to file information in those same courts as an ordinary aggrieved person living under the Crown. Prosecution for ordinary libel was correct only if the King was able to appear and to give evidence. And it would have been sound legal doctrine for the King as a person to have appeared, as distinct from the Crown, which is impersonal and not always identical with the person of the Monarch. The constitutional legal distinction is nice but sound and can be completely operative. There is no sound reason in law why the King cannot be a fellow-citizen with the humblest citizen, on points of domestic justice, as a private individual, living under the Crown. If there is, he has no right to be represented as a private citizen suffering private wrong, to please the interested legal whim of lawyers in a Court Record. Where the King cannot appear in person he cannot be represented as a person. Yet this is how Sir Rufus Isaacs represented him: as an individual and not as the Crown. It was a traversy of procedure and therefor of justice, no matter how great the factual guilt of the accused may have been.

DUKE OF BEDFORD AND THE INDIAN DEADLOCK

The Oriental Post, edited by Mohammed Ally Khan, published in London, in its issue for April 1944, published, beneath the above sub-heading, the following letter from the Duke of Bedford :—

"Dear Sir,

Many thanks for sending me a copy of your interesting paper. I am afraid that my knowledge of Indian affairs is too slight for me to be able to send you an article which would be worth publishing. I must confess that originally I held the view that the contribution of the Indian civil servants, etc., to the welfare of the country had been very great indeed and that there were probably not enough Indians possessed of sufficient administrative ability and freedom from corruption and nepotism to govern the country as well as the British governed it. Of recent years, however, I have had such bitter experience of the appalling incompetence and self-seeking of the members of our own Legislature and administration and of the stranglehold which the tyranny of Finance exercises wherever it has been able to extend its influence, that I have come to feel that probably those British and Indian writers and speakers are unhappily not far from the truth when they say that, taking one thing with another, we have delayed the progress of India far more than we have assisted it. Anyhow, if the majority of the Indian people desire their freedom, it appears hypocritical to deny it to them in view of some of our professed war aims—not that I think that these latter ever seriously troubled the consciences of our most prominent statesmen! I should be interested, some time, to hear the terms of what you would consider a suitable partnership between Britain and India which might provide a way out of the present deadlock. The enclosed may perhaps interest you.

Yours truly,

BEDFORD.

In an introduction to this letter, the editor of our contemporary says :—

Of the many letters we have received, one is from the Duke of Bedford. We consider it very important and to the point. It is a simple, direct, sincere desire to find a solution.

In an editorial comment, Mr. Khan asks the Duke to work for a peace partnership in India in co-operation with Indian leaders, this being the only way conceivable out of the deadlock, or else to suggest an alternative policy.

The editorial poses the challenge :—

Will the noble Duke come forward and make history. (History is always made in the critical hour). Time alone will tell. We simply hope His Grace will, and he will find us to meet him more than half way. . . .

Stating that " his fair, unbiassed and cool judgments have earned him the respect and admiration " of " the thinking people of the world," our contemporary explains :—

His Grace the Duke of Bedford is an outstanding figure in the British public life to-day. A confirmed pacifist, the noble Duke has shown the great courage of his convictions against the ridicule of the Left and the Right political forces of the country, forming a united front against him. He has been unjustly labelled as pro-fascist.

Speaking of The Better Way, which it reprints, the Post says :—

. . . . we have no hesitation in saying that there could be no better, clearer a case made out for pacifism. Its logic is absolute. . . . Unhappily there is nothing in it to enlighten us on the lessons learned from the Indian struggle under pacifism, for, it will be admitted, that India has presented to the world for many years a practical demonstration of pacifism on the mass scale and has paid dearly for it. It would have been certainly a very interesting reading.

The Duke of Bedford has been attacked and misrepresented so much in the ordinary Press, that we feel it to be a duty to reproduce a tribute to him from the columns of an avowed Christian paper.

The Signpost, published in Leeds, in its issue for October, 1944, contains a tribute written by Pastor George Truswell, of the Leeds Christian Evangelical Mission. Mr. Truswell writes :—

A CHRISTIAN DUKE

An Impression.

One of the greatest tragedies in the realm of Government in both Church and State to-day is the lack of men with definite and uncompromising Christian convictions. How different the state of affairs when men went to the seat of Government for principle and the love of humanity.

Ever since the present Duke of Bedford renounced his patronage of the Church of England because of its un-Christian attitude to war he has been before the public eye. No man has been so misrepresented and abused. Almost every newspaper in the land has scorned and ridiculed him. The result is that the man in the street, who gets all his facts from a one-sided Press has a wrong idea altogether of one of the few men in the Legislature who during these years of war has done anything at all to call the world back to sanity.

The Duke is ridiculed and abused because of his pacifist principles. He feels war to be wrong and says so. Only a lunatic would think war to be right, and yet every time the Duke is brought before the public eye it is with the impression that he is unpatriotic, when all the time he is standing for Christian principle. He is indefatigable in the efforts he makes in the House of Lords and throughout the country from the public platform, but the things he does and says are not reported in the Press. If they were the opinion of the people would be changed entirely. Where most of our leaders have gone under in matters of principle he has ever taken a consistent stand.

The Duke of Bedford is a prolific writer, scores of booklets are constantly coming from his pen. On the matters with which he deals the Duke is a specialist. He sees through the clap-trap and the dope of modern propaganda and he gives the lie to much that is passing as popular opinion. Taken at random he has written on such subjects as " Why Have This War? " " Diplomacy and War Guilt," " What a Game," " Don't be a Gull," a pamphlet written for those who WANT LOTS MORE WAR and for those who don't; " Why Blunder On," etc., etc., all of which are written from the standpoint of Christian common sense. The Duke is particularly helpful in the matter of Finance. This is a matter on which the majority of people are entirely ignorant, and this ignorance is to their great loss, for it leaves them at the mercy of a vicious system. In this department alone he is an expert, and if men and women only used the sense they were born with they would listen to what he has to say on this most important matter.

Most of all the Duke is to be admired for the noble stand that he has taken in the House of Lords in the interests of the genuine Conscientious Objector. When others have failed in their duty he has courageously fought for liberty and conscience. He has also made repeated protest against the many restrictions which the war has imposed on the liberty of individuals which are not always to a nation's credit.

It is passing strange that in a land that loves liberty, a man like the Duke should be so cold-shouldered, but the last six years of observation of his activities has convinced us of the rightness of his cause. If there is one man in the realm of influence for which we should thank God, and which the Church should support and pray for, it is THE DUKE OF BEDFORD.

UNITED STATES LETTERBOX

U.S. TRUTH SEEKER APPEAL.

38 Park Row, New York, N. Y.,
August 26, 1944.

Dear Friend and Fellow-Editor,—The war has made more difficult the publishing of a Freethought paper through censorship. The suit filed last year against the Collector of Customs for holding imported books is still pending in the United Circuit Court of Appeals. When, after the filing of the suit, the Government delivered the seized shipments, we sent substantial orders to England for Freethought books. These later shipments, though forwarded six months or more ago, have been held by the Customs, thus making a joke of the courts and causing us, through inability to fill orders, more expense, and much extra work. The Government is giving us the run-around.

On August 10, 1944, we filed a second suit in the Federal District Court against Collector of Customs Harry M. Durning to obtain delivery of the recently seized shipments. The defendant has 60 days within which to reply. The lying daily advertising sheets known as newspapers did not regard the filing of the suit as news, except that " The New York Times " reported it as " a suit for a judicial ruling whether the freedom of speech, the press and religion exist in a greater degree in Great Britain than in the United States."

We ask your aid and co-operation in the struggle to maintain " The Truth Seeker " as the best memorial to George Macdonald.

Notwithstanding their gain in political power and wealth, the churches are, in our opinion, slowly losing their hold on the people. We shall continue to maintain a centre for the dissemination of Freethought, without compromise. We see no reason why the case for Atheism should not be discussed and considered as frankly and as fully as the case for Theism. That is democracy. As we are not running for office, we can afford to do this with no softening of the truth or pandering to the hesitations of the sentimentalists.

Yours for equal liberty for Americans and Britishers,

CHARLES SMITH (Editor).

Dear Guy A. Aldred,

It was with some gratification that I noticed that you gave generous space in the August issue of "The Word" concerning the treatment of American Conchies by the present administration. The people in Britain should know the truth about a government that claims to be the champion of oppressed people everywhere.

I read your publication with great interest and admiration—your topics are so vital, and you discuss them fearlessly. We have nothing approaching the spirit of your paper in the United States. An attempt in that direction would be popular. For the most part, the very heart of our objections to conscription, regimentation, and war is destroyed by the supine acceptance of the principle of conscription by almost all the pacifist organisations. Our American Civil Liberties Union has gone on record that it will not oppose military conscription, because that form of slavery was put over on our people a few times in the past and they adjude it constitutional; and further that in its judgment a labour conscription is also constitutional, and that devotion to the Bill of Rights must be replaced by a devotion to the war effort. Thus it prepares the basis for washing its hands of any attempt to challenge these violations of the Bill of Rights. That is an attempt to let our liberties go by default. It has made one concession to conscience, and that is it will attempt to help the individual Conchie, but in doing so will try to avoid the challenge to conscription. So far it has been more obstructionist than a help in defending conscience.

"It Might Have Happened to You" is a splendid attempt to come to the defence of the unpopular victims of war hysteria. We have the same prejudices and abuses operating here, with no one to defend these victims as ably as you have. Unfortunately, many of the men and women who have witnessed the demoralising effects of condemning an entire race for the sins of a few, are the very first to insist upon this intolerance that is helping to ruin our civilisation. Labour leaders are doing much to increase this intolerance, and civil liberties organisations show no ardour for defending unpopular individuals at this moment.

For that reason we take new courage every time we see your outspoken and vigorous defence of

EDWARD SHAW'S APPEAL

The following report is culled from The Glasgow Herald for Friday, October 6, 1944 :—

ORDER FOR MEDICAL EXAMINATION.
Glasgow Conviction Quashed.

The Justiciary Appeal Court (the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lords Mackay and Stevenson) yesterday quashed a conviction obtained in Glasgow Sheriff Court against Edward Shaw, 173 Dalmarnock Road, Bridgeton, Glasgow, on a charge under the National Service Act, 1939, of having failed to comply with an order to submit himself for medical examination.

The facts found proved showed that the appellant had been served with a notice requiring him to submit himself for medical examination at 917 Dumbarton Road, Glasgow, at 2-30 p.m on June 21, 1944. The appellant, who on the date in question was in custody, was taken to 917 Dumbarton Road in a police van, arriving there about 2 20 p.m.

He was asked by the clerk in charge of the waiting-room if he would submit to medical examination, but he refused. He was thereafter taken to the medical officer in attendance, and he again refused when asked if he would submit himself for examination.

The appellant was then taken to the Marine Police Office, arriving there between 2-25 and 2-30 p.m.

"A QUIBBLE."

Before Sheriff-substitute A. H. Denholm Gillies, before whom the appellant was charged, he maintained that as he was in custody at the Marine Police Office on June 21, 1944, at 2-30 p.m, he could not be in attendance at 9-17 Dumbarton Road as ordered by the notice served on him.

The Sheriff-substitute considered that argument was a quibble, and that 5 or 10 minutes one way or the other was not a sufficient ground for vitiating the proceedings. He passed sentence of 12 months' imprisonment.

In moving that the appeal be sustained, the Lord Justice-Clerk said it had been said with truth that the appellant's argument was of the most technical kind, but, on the other hand, he did not see how their Lordships could refrain from giving effect to it, because the obligation on the appellant to submit himself to examination was defined with precision in the statute and echoed in the Order, and it was an obligation which only became operative at 2-30 p.m.

A statutory offence of that kind could not be committed, in his Lordship's view, in anticipation, nor could a prosecution be brought because a person said in advance that he intended to commit a statutory offence.

The other Judges concurred. Appellant, who pleaded his own case, was allowed 10 guineas expenses.

The Scottish Daily Express, same day, recorded the facts in a somewhat humorous strain. We reproduce the headings and the opening and closing paragraphs :—

EDWARD SHAW SAVED MONTHS ON MINUTES
Refused "medical," sentenced, freed.

At 2-30 p.m on June 21, 1944, Edward Shaw was to present himself for medical examination which would help decide what form of national service he would do.

The time—2-30 p.m.—is very important because Edward Shaw is a stickler for time. . . .

So Edward Shaw, who pleaded his own case and won it on a matter of minutes, left court to spend in a different way 12 months which might have been passed in jail. And his expenses were fixed at £10 10s.

Despite the reporter's humour, the decision of the High Court is sound. The Sheriff-Substitute ought not to have denounced the argument as a "quibble." It was a correct constitutional argument and it is in such considerations that the liberty and rights of the citizen rest.

This is Shaw's fourth appeal to the High Court of Justiciary by way of Stated Case, since he was convicted first in the Glasgow Sheriff Court, on July 1, 1942, by Sheriff-Substitute MacDonald. He was ordered to be detained seven days for medical examination.

Shaw's appeal was heard on September 22, 1942. The conviction was upheld and the case remitted back to the Sheriff-Substitute.

Shaw surrendered himself to the Glasgow Court, on October 6, 1942. Notices were served on him for medical examination, which Shaw refused to obey. The case came before Sheriff-Substitute Haldane, on October 20, when Shaw raised certain preliminary objections. These were repelled, and on October 29 Shaw was found guilty, and fined £5 and allowed fourteen days within which to pay the fine. He appealed, and his appeal was dismisesd on March 17, 1943.

The Ministry of Labour did not proceed against him again until December 21, 1943. He then appeared before Sheriff Haldane. He raised objections, which were repelled. The case was tried on January 17, 1944, and on January 25, the Sheriff found the accused guilty and ordered him to be detained for a period not exceeding seven days for the purpose of medical examination. Shaw appealed this case and his appeal was dismissed in June 1944.

In each of these cases, the High Court of Justiciary granted no expenses to the Crown against the appellant.

On June 22, Shaw again appeared in the Glasgow Sheriff Court, before Sheriff-Substitute A. H. Denholm Gillies. The hearing was adjourned to June 27, when he was convicted and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. His fourth appeal—against this conviction—was successful, and he received expenses against the Crown.

Naturally, the objections taken in each Stated Case were distinct : one cannot challenge a proposition that has been decided by the High Court. On each occasion there was an irregularity in procedure which formed the basis of appeal. No expenses were given against Shaw in the three cases in which his appeals were repelled because the Court felt each time that there had been irregularity but not sufficient to constitute a sound plea of objection in law. In the fourth appeal the Court felt that his objection was unanswerable. The appeals were not merely delaying actions.

Since his first summons was served, and throughout the subsequent proceedings, Shaw has approached us for advice. We felt that it was our duty to advise him ; to discuss the points of his various appeals with him ; to advise him as to precedents and definitions ; and to draw up his legal objections. All this has been done without cost to him or to the movement, and without fuss. His victory is in exactly the same legal category, and as complete as that of the four Trotskyists, whose case the I.L.P. and the Anarchists supported at various meetings, at which hundreds of pounds were raised to throw away on solicitors and King's counsel. The Trotskyist cases were utterly unworthy of all the fuss, and it is a disgrace that money that ought to be used for propaganda should be dissipated on lawyers in the absurd fashion that was done in these cases.

Two C.O. cases that went to Edinburgh, concerning girl comrades, emphasise the moral of the Shaw case.

In one case the accused was persuaded to go to a lawyer who professed to have Labour and C.O. sympathies. He advised her to plead guilty. She refused and consulted us. We suggested that she conduct her own case and raise certain preliminary objections. Her lawyer refused to accept these objections and said he was unable to argue them. He insisted on substituting quite different objections : one of these was clearly fallacious and negatived by the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908. It was apparent that he could not read legally the Act.

At the trial, he put his client into the witness-box without warning, and after informing her that he would not do so. Naturally, she fumbled and stumbled. He urged no plea in mitigation. She was fined £15. She raised the money for the Stated Case and consigned the required sum in Court, giving it to her lawyer. He then withdrew from the case and she was left to plead her case in person and to speak to law points she had not raised as distinct from and opposed to the objections she wished to raise. Her conviction and fine were upheld but no expenses were given against her. When she went back to the Sheriff Court she found that her lawyer had lifted her caution money for himself to cover his costs.

Had we been in her place we would have taken action against both the lawyer and the Sheriff Clerk. Despite the statements in his letters, the Sheriff Clerk had no right, under the terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 —and its very clear and very exact terms—to permit that money to be lifted by the lawyer privately, when the accused was conducting her appeal in person. The lawyer had no right to collect the money under such circumstances. His claim for expenses was a different matter and had no relation to the money consigned in Court. The Sheriff Clerk of Lanarkshire was gravely in error and the lawyer was guilty of unprofessional conduct. Both should have been censured. The girl was menaced with imprisonment for not paying money actually consigned in Court.

In the other case, exactly similar, the accused acted under our advice throughout. She was fined £2 only. Her conviction was upheld without expenses. She has received since unconditional exemption.

The Sheriff Court at Glasgow has shown great courtesy to the accused in all these cases. The defence has suffered no harm from conducting the case in person. This is as it should be.

In the Sheriff Court at Hamilton, where we conducted the defence—and won—in two Anarchist fire-watching cases, every courtesy was shown both by the Sheriff and the Procurator-Fiscal. A somewhat different atmosphere prevailed at the Dumbarton Sheriff Court on the one occasion that we appeared there, for a girl who did not want to be deported to England. Finally she was successful and the Court showed some consideration. But the Sheriff evinced a touching bias for solicitors and strong objection both to the person who really pleads in person, unless pleading guilty,and to a layman pleading on such a person's behalf. Actually, the Courts should be made people's courts : and Statutes should be altered at least to make it possible for unpaid public defenders to plea, whether officially lawyers or not, so long as the decorum of public pleading is preserved. Under certain circumstances, the layman may be a greater and abler jurist than the professional lawyer. The present division of the Bar in Britain into solicitors and barristers or advocates is absurd. There ought to be only counsellors-at-law and not two departments to the profession. This division is merely a professional extension of the anti-layman attitude.

It will be foolish if bombastic comments are made on the Shaw case at open-air meetings. The decision was a sound and strictly legal decision. The conduct of the Court, in recording the decision, reflects great credit on the Lord Justice Clerk, and Lords Mackay and Stevenson, who heard the appeal. It is a triumph for reason and for democratic justice. But it does mean that persons must have been sentenced previously in the Sheriff Court who ought not to have been sentenced : for clearly the right to irregularity of procedure has been assumed to have been justifiable by Ministry of Labour officials. Shaw's case cannot have been the first case of irregular timing.

The time decision now given is binding in other cases still pending. It is most important. The decision will retain its importance after conscription has been swept from the Statute Book and the horrors of the present war are but vague memories of an inglorious episode in human struggle. The very importance of this decision, and the unwillingness of lawyers to defend adequately in conchie cases, and their reluctance to do so in poverty cases, since their "overhead" charges must be met and dabbling in misery is their profession, directs attention to the concluding plea of the "Prisoners at the Bar" essay, in our pamphlet, A Call to Manhood.

We plead for a layman to be recognised in every city and village as an unpaid public defender. The need for such a person to protect the poor, and to defend the civil rights of the citizen, so long as our present social system exists, is shown to be imperative by the Shaw case. Until this is done, we are prepared—as far as time and energy permits, always remembering that we are but one person—freely to help those who are in trouble, and are too poor to engage lawyers. We cannot appear for them in Courts, except by special permission of the Sheriff or the Magistrate, as the case may be, and we are unwilling to seek such permission—which might be granted in some cases and refused in others. We can advise and guide, which may mean a great deal.

Reverting to Edward Shaw, we suggest to the Ministry of Labour that these prosecutions should cease. We have known Shaw for several years. He holds very definite anti-militarist views and has no intention of becoming a soldier. He was born on January 10, 1906, and so is now over thirty-eight years of age. Not a very good age for military experiment under a sorry economic system. Why not accept the fact that he is a conscientious objector or war-resister?

Continuous Court appearances have all the appearance of a persecution. In Shaw's case, they have lost their dignity and must be considered either ridiculous or vindictive. A very poor advertisement for authority. Why not accept facts and leave Shaw alone? Allow that his conduct has established his objection and his uselessness to the military cause.

"CONCHIE" FELLOWSHIP

BY DOUGLAS ROGERS

Between October 21 and 28, conscientious objectors throughout Britain were meeting together in fellowship week.

Nearly 100 meetings had been arranged throughout Britain, and in one town, Derby, meetings were arranged for each night of the week.

What is in C.O.'s minds these days? Obviously, very much to the front is the fact that the War is approaching its end and the "peace" that will follow it is an immense, vacant, questioning void. C.O.s, like everybody else, will be wondering where they will stand in the social turmoil that must follow the ending of hostilities.

This fellowship of conscientious objectors is an odd business really. Here are several thousands of men and women driven together into a single grouping from a variety of reasons but with one thing in common that on a single, particular, immediate issue their varying convictions compelled them to take the same stand. It is a unity of circumstance rather than of desire. And it is based in its essentials upon something negative. How far can this unity, based upon the determination not to do something, be sustained and turned into a positive unity to do something that can continue into the peace? Certainly this is something very much in my own mind and I expect it will be in the minds of my comrade war resisters.

How far is there a sense of fellowship among conscientious objectors? It is not a stable quantity. It is strongest in the face of persecution; it is weakest when there is no sense of being driven together in self-defence. It is strong in prison. I remember my own emotions when, after the first three desolate days without any real human contact, I looked across the prison workshop and saw a chap nodding his head towards me questioningly and shaping his fingers to the letters "C.O.". It was immensely sustaining and such was our fellowship in gaol.

And only this afternoon, in different circumstances, I had demonstrated to me the sense of being driven into a position of unity with people on a single issue. It was at a Press reception given by the officers of the National Peace Council in connection with a "National Petition for a Constructive Peace". I had gone there with a good deal of scepticism and prejudice. The petition aggravated me. It was so manifestly right in its motives. And it was so manifestly futile.

Here was a recital in broad, generalised terms of the primary, essential conditions of a peace that can flourish, expand and endure. But how to get them? Good-hearted folk were expected to express their agreement by signing the petition which, after listing these conditions, prayed His Majesty's Government to formulate such a programme of constructive peace-making, to put it into action at home as fully and as speedily as possible, and to commend it vigorously in the international field as the necesary basis for an enduring peace. And here were Professor Norman Bentwich, Dr. C. E. M. Joad, Dame Sybil Thorndike, the Rev. Henry Carter and Mr. Gerald Bailey to use their charm and persuasion in convincing the representatives of the Press that they should support such a programme. What nonsense As far as I could gather, the daily Press was represented alone by the generous soul of Hannen Swaffer. One can guess what the hard-bitten news-editors of the capitalist dailies thought about it!

I was thinking that the basis of prayer is faith and I had no faith in the Government to whom we were supposed to pray.

The good and eminent folk at the head of the table said their pieces and the Press were invited to ask questions. Then it was that a sarcastic hard-faced man said: "Are Polish refugees who have had their women and children murdered by the Germans going to be asked to sign this petition?" The strict answer was that only British nationals could petition Parliament but, since implicit in a constructive peace is a denial of Vansittartism and an insistence that the German people must help make the peace, our Hun-hating Press-man asked about six more questions with accelerating bitterness, all suggesting that humanity's most urgent and compelling task was to punish the Germans and to continue to punish them, generation after generation, until Doomsday, even the unborn Germans apparently being bad.

Here was the voice of hate and bitterness and blind, unreasoning emotion that is now shaping the peace. Here was the voice of authority that will commit us to blunder through another generation of fear and suspicion, mistakes and national antagonisms, into another chaos of world slaughter.

Only one thing was then urgent. That was to resist the wave of unthinking hate which, if we are not guarded, will drown every hope of moving towards a decent world. Obviously, only fundamental social changes can, banish war and poverty, but inasmuch as we can defend reason against blind emotion we shall increase our opportunities of making these social changes. And here at once was the need for vigorous defence.

It did not change my mind about the petition. I still think that, well-meaning as it is, it is in itself utterly futile. But in that moment I knew that the well-meaning men and women who sponsored it were the allies of all who want the good new world of truth, co-operation and peace, and want to be rid for ever of the bad old world of lies, rivalry and war. And I would not then have said one word of criticism of them or their petition. You do not say these things in the presence of those who would hate the goodwill contained in it. Therein is the drawing together of people in defence.

What I want to say to other C.O.s is this. In this war we have, in self-defence, found fellowship. In the peace which will soon be upon us our struggle will broaden in the quest for a world of peace. As the struggle broadens we shall find new allies as the dangers and urgencies crowd upon us and, although we must at all costs remember that our differences are as nothing compared with our agreement. Because there is a gulf between the people of goodwill who look eagerly towards a better world and the people of bad-will who, sunk beyond survival in the cynicism of the old-world, can never escape from it.

Swaffer said one thing, simple but profound, which is the rejection of all who can remember nothing but their hates: "It is the new world which matters and not the old war!"

During five years of war, of ostracism and misunderstandings, C.O.s will many of them have been given a sense of segregation from society so that they are in danger of feeling detached and fundamentally different from those with whom for five years they have been in such disagreement. Yet in fundamental respects our ideals are not much removed from thousands who, with equal sincerity, felt compelled to support the war.

As we move forward out of the negative struggle against war into the positive struggle for peace, let us look firstly for men and women with whom we may join hands in common cause, and if we do that, somewhere and somewhen we shall find a common, effective action.

NEW ZEALAND LETTERS

The following letters were in the mail when the September issue was passing through the press. Readers will be interested to note the references to our comrade, Dr. Sidney Townend.

Addressed to the Duke of Bedford:—

My Dear Duke,—You put the monetary reform position very clearly and simply. It is explanations of this type that are required. Nearly all social credit publications strees in colourful language the machinations of the international financiers or gangsters, as they are sometimes called. While maybe the reflection is well merited I wonder if it has occurred to social credit publicists that by enhancing in this manner the unsavoury reputations of the bankers they create in the mind of the reader the idea; "These chaps who control the monetary system are devilish clever. I'm afraid it's beyond my poor intellect. I give up"? That is the effect it has on me.

Many of my friends are monetary reformers. Last week when I was released from prison, I left behind me an English enthusiast, Dr. Sidney Townend, a textile expert specially brought to this country. He has heard you speak in England and is very lavish in his praise of you. He is refusing to co-operate in the defaulters' detention camps.

Did I tell you about the attack made upon you by F. A. Hornibrook, the Freethinker? My wife took up the cudgels on your behalf, but with the attacker in England and the defender in New Zealand it was impossible to pursue the discussion.

You must be amused at some of the charges made against you. I remember at the time the statue was painted you were described in cable news as the "82-year-old Duke of Bedford"! How useful is "Who's Who" to the newspaper man!

Just before leaving Paparua prison a warder and I were holding a political discussion—he was a radical—and he mentioned reactionaries "like the Duke of Bedford"! I asked why you were a reactionary and was informed that you were pro-German and had gone to Dublin to negotiate with the German Minister. He added that you were seen leading the Bedfordshire Hunt, at full gallop, across a military airdrome!

Very gently, I pointed out that you had been confused possibly with your father; that when you went to Dublin you were not Duke of Bedford; that hunting was abnoxious to you and that you sat on the socialist benches in the House of Lords. But just imagine your 82-year-old father leading the hunt!

The Press has done its job of misrepresentation quite well.

In two days' time I shall appear in the civil court charged with refusing to obey a military order and expect to be duly sentenced to defaulter's detention for the duration.

The detention camps, I feel, are a dangerous precedent to establish and for that and many other reasons, I decline to co-operate, I expect to remain in prison for the duration. After 2½ years of the dreary monotony of prison life I am not thrilled at the prospect of returning, but there is nothing else for it. We must struggle on.

Fraternally yours,

MICHAEL YOUNG.

Burnham Detention Barracks,
Canterbury, New Zealand, 12/5/44.

Addressed to the editor:—

Dear Guy Aldred,— You may be interested to learn the latest news of my husband.

He was sentenced to Defaulter's Detention at Strathmore for the duration, after being held at Burnham Military Camp near Christchurch. As he does not believe in making conscription work, he refused to obey orders, and was sentenced to three months in Mt. Eden Gaol, Auckland. This has become the practice of Magistrates in dealing with non-co-operators. Formerly, the non-co-operator was brought before a J.P. (in his private room and not in open court) and sentenced, or "transferred," to prison for the duration.

At the expiry of his three months' sentence, my husband will be taken to one of the "concentration camps," as they are termed in both military and police circles here. The procedure will be repeated.

Recently, two C.O.s who were serving a three months' sentence at one prison for non-co-operation in detention camp were transferred to another, and were actually shackled together en route. One of these men was Dr. Sidney Townend, a textile expert from Leeds, who was imported by the N.Z. government to give assistance to the industry here. Rather a curious form of hospitality, isn't it?

It is so true that if we take the sword to overthrow Nazidom instead of genuinely seeking to remove its cause, we are forced to adopt its methods. It amazes me that people are still deluded by the idea of a "war for liberty".

Sincerely yours,

(Mrs) WINIFRED M. YOUNG.

DUNDEE PROPAGANDA

Our recent visit to Dundee under the auspices of the Dundee Fabian Society recalls our previous visits to the Jute City.

We delivered our first lecture in Dundee on Sunday afternoon, July 13, 1913, at Shore Terrace, the subject being "Socialism and God." There was a large audience and a good discussion. At night, we spoke at Albert Square, the subject being "When Trade Unions Fail."

These meetings were organised by the well-known Dundee Anarchist and poet, Lowden Macartney, who used the pen-name, "Alvan Marlaw." Macartney had a small but famous bookshop in the Overgate, known as "The Poet's Box." He had this shop up to a year ago and vacated it only because of his great age and growing frailty.

Reporting the meetings in The Herald of Revolt for August, 1913, Macartney stated that the subject of the second lecture was one of "such vital importance." He added :—

It was not the old-fashioned—the Orthodox—Trade Unionism, Aldred was up against. He did not spare the Industrialists and Syndicalists, but demonstrated that they cannot accomplish what they had set out to do—overthrow Capitalism and establish Socialism—all that they or anyone can do is, enlighten the Proletariat, spread the ideas of Revolution and Economic Emancipation, so that when the time is ripe, and the social conditions force the workers into a general revolt, they will know what they are out for, and take it. The questions came fast and furious. They were all fully and adequately answered. The strongest criticism came from comrade Esterman of the local S.L.P.

Esterman has become a doctor and long since left Dundee and the Movement. The S.L.P. has passed away. Our propaganda carries on, not because it is hopeless, but because the task requires patience and social error is entrenched firmly owing to the economics of the daily struggle and the deadly fear of truth and life that paralyses the energy and thought of those who exist from day to day.

The Monday evening meeting was a continuation, almost, of the Sunday evening discussion. In dealing with Industrial Unionism, we mentioned the parables of Jesus, and stirred up religious discussion. Some local orthodox Christians rushed into the fray and, wrote Macartney, were much astonished to hear the "infidels" expound their own doctrines in a way their parsons dare not do.

We addressed three more large meetings before completing this visit.

Our second visit to Dundee was in October. The feature of this visit was the sermon we delivered under the auspices of the Unitarian congregation, known as the Free Religious Movement. Macartney reported this address in The Herald of Revolt for December 1913, as follows :—

On Sunday evening, October 26, Guy Aldred spoke in the Forresters' Hall, before the congregation of "The Free Religious Movement," a body which is undoubtedly the most broad-minded of any calling itself a church.

It was owing to the goodwill of an influential member that Aldred was invited to occupy the platform. When he submitted several subject titles to be chosen from, he was told to select his own subject and "deliver his message," in his own way. Accordingly he lectured on "Satan's Synagogue," taking for his text, Rev. 2, 9; "I know the blasphemy of those who say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan."

He explained the teachings and acts of Jesus of Nazareth from a purely materialistic standpoint; blasphemy, for instance, being a sin against the "Holy Spirit," i.e., the spirit of truth—not a supernatural being.

Then there was his (Christ's) advice to the Woman of Samaria to worship God in spirit and in truth, not in the mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem—that is, not by kneeling and praying, and other devotional acts, but by the right conduct. In this manner he secularised the whole of Christ's teaching, and maintained that he was simply a popular leader, whose language, adapted to the understanding of those among whom he lived, has been distorted from its original meaning by theologians of the church.

The lecturer made a very favourable impression. The younger members of the audience, especially, gave signs of the liveliest appreciation. It was all so new to them, so different from the kind of discourse they are accustomed to. The most disappointing part of the affair was the weakness of the opposition.

We had the literature set out on a broad window ledge in the vestibule, and it was eagerly bought up at the close of the meeting. Altogether, we had reason to be pleased with the result.

One chief source of satisfaction is the fact that the audience was largely composed of persons who would not have been attracted to an ordinary meeting. They were roused and interested; possibly a few of them were shocked, for they heard what, when properly understood, was rank atheism, preached by a young stranger, who both piqued and gratified their curiosity.

Aldred's appearance on this platform has given offence to a number of those of our "movement" to whom the very name of church is tabooed. They did not go to hear him, but were content to remain outside and criticise. Had they heard him, they might have had less fault to find.

Our third visit was in December 1913. But there seems to be no reports of the meetings addressed on this occasion.

Before making our fourth visit we had suffered four courts-martial, been released from prison twice under the Cat and Mouse Act, and discharged in disgrace from the Army we had refused to join!

It was appropriate that this campaign in Dundee should be under the auspices of the International Union of Ex-Servicemen. We were advertised, without our consent or knowledge, in handbills and in the columns of the Dundee Telegraph as "Guy Aldred of Glasgow and London" and the "famous Guy Aldred." At one of the meetings we spoke in company with Captain White, advertised as being "Son of Sir George White, Defender of Ladysmith." The chairman at this and many of the other meetings during this visit was W. P. Henderson, the one-time famous Dundee footballer. Comrade Henderson now lives in Glasgow and is no longer active in the movement. At this time he did tremendous work on behalf of the ex-Servicemen living in Dundee.

The ex-Servicemen of Dundee, who had fought through the war and had returned to poverty and slums, many of them injured for life, had no feelings of resentment against the Socialist conscientious objector. On the contrary, they regarded him as a comrade in the great struggle and, in every way, demonstrated the greatest fraternity and solidarity.

Our recent visit was under the auspices of the Dundee Fabian Society. The active organiser of this meeting was our comrade, J. M. Wallace, who produces a weekly Socialist commentary on the struggle in Dundee, called The Spotlight. This is obtainable from him at his address, 23 Hillside Road, Dundee. The chairman was J. M. Scott, secretary of the local branch of the National Council of Labour Colleges.

There is some talk of our returning to Dundee for a debate on Socialism.

MERSEYSIDE PACIFIST JOINT COMMITTEE.

We see our common job of peace-making from different angles. It seems so vast and involved from any angle that we lose sight of the whole.

The activity indicated below is an attempt to help pacifists to see the whole.

At HOPE STREET CHURCH, LIVERPOOL,
SUNDAYS at 3-30 p.m.

Peace Services have been and will be conducted by Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A.

At FRIENDS INSTITUTE, ISLINGTON, LIVERPOOL, at 7-30 p.m.

MONDAYS, TUESDAYS and SATURDAYS.

During October, many meetings have been held addressed by various speakers. Enquire about future meetings.

COMMUNISM
THE STORY OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY

"COMMUNISTS" AND THE WAR MOSCOW TO-DAY

"Communism"! Sic forsooth, ahem, and spare the mark! Likewise discard the mask.

The News Review, London, an Odham's Press publication that is not opposed to the Stalinist regime, in its issue for September 21, published the following report from its Moscow corespondent :—

For anyone with the time and money, life has improved in Moscow as rapidly as the Red Army has advanced on the front. But not everyone by any means has the necessary roubles.

The new unrationed Soviet Commercial Department stores, food shops and restaurants contain everything to wear, eat and drink. But prices are very high and queues are long.

Reportedly, the remainder of the ration system (in low-priced State stores) will be abolished before the end of the war. But for the average Russian rationing remains a reality. Prices of unrationed goods prevent him from buying more than a smattering of luxuries.

Commercial food stores were instituted in Moscow last March with prices about as high as on the free markets, where peasants can sell their surplus produce without State control. Some sample prices on the free market (in roubles for 1 kilogramme. The rouble equals approximately a shilling): White bread, 275. Sweet butter, 800. Eggs, 15 roubles each. Beef, 320. Sugar, 650.

The average war-time wage-earner receives about 600 roubles monthly. A month's work will buy about 2 lb. of sugar in a commercial store.

A man's woollen suit in a commercial store costs 4500 roubles, men's shoes 1000 to 3700, women's rayon stockings 280, toilet soap 85 to 150. A worker can spend his average monthly wage on a pair of children's shoes alone.

But the salaries of factory directors and other important executives run as high as 10,000 roubles monthly with overtime pay and bonuses. Within their reach are such items as a piano at 20,000 roubles, a woman's caracul coat at 17,000.

Rents, compared with store prices, are low. A three-room flat costs an average of 480 roubles monthly, but the average worker considers himself lucky to have a single room for a family of three or four at a much smaller rent.

Queues are as much an obstacle to purchase as prices. Lines five blocks long coil around and away from "Mostorg," Moscow's main department store. Inside there are more queues. A day's work is often involved in making a single purchase.

This is "Communism" according to the contemptible "Communist" stooges, Gallacher, Pritt, Pollitt & Co. Pioneers of Socialism were murdered, bogus trials arranged, Trotsky was assassinated, Anarchists killed in prisons as counter-revolutionaries, that this state of affairs might come to be in the name of the proletarian revolution. When are the workers going to politically repudiate and destroy utterly these insufferable knaves and hypocrites.

CONSCRIPTION AFTER THE WAR.

Rhys Davies and Guy Aldred in Great Protest Demonstration.

SPECIALLY REPORTED FOR THESE COLUMNS BY J. R. HENDERSON.

[We were unable to publish the following report by our Comrade "Gowrie" in our November issue.—Ed.]

The meeting held on October 8th in Glasgow under the auspices of the No Conscription League proved to be one of the most successful and inspiring demonstrations against war and conscription that has yet been held in the country. The Cosmo Cinema was filled, and there were no signs of opposition. Glasgow showed its appreciation of the work and the magnificent records of the two speakers, Rhys Davies and Guy Aldred, in wholehearted fashion, and Mr. Rhys Davies confided to comrades before leaving the city that this was his finest meeting of the war so far.

In opening, BAILIE ALEX. PORTER, chairman, said that at the end of five years we still find people willing to support the continuation of the war. Even the churches are holding days of prayer thanking God for the success of the Allied Forces on the battlefield. Millions of men have either lost their lives or been maimed. Hundreds of thousands of people have been and are being rendered homeless. There is as yet no organised effort to give effect to the feeling which is general that the war should now end.

The speakers were both well-known men, with long records of consistent opposition to war and militarism. They would probably disagree about nine out of ten subjects, but they were united on the question of war. The No Conscription League considers that there is more need for its existence to-day than there was at the outbreak of hostilities. We now find that many members of Parliament are anxious that conscription should continue during the peace. As long as conscription remains on the Statute Book in this country, we will fight it in every shape and form. We will encourage young men and women to take their stand against it. At the moment it is the most important subject facing the people of this country. (Applause.)

WAR AND THE WORKERS.

GUY ALDRED, who was warmly received, said in the course of his speech:

"Post-war conscription will not begin the day after peace is concluded. It is being developed now, both in a practical way and by an insidious propaganda which is being carried on at the present time. It is very necessary from time to time to assert one's opposition to the Government and to the powers that be. Rhys Davies has maintained a consistent anti-militarist stand in the House of Commons, and is one of the most prominent of the men who are going about the country rousing the people against military and industrial conscription.

"The very nature of capitalism implies war. It implies the struggle for markets. It implies the dominance of the financier over the people. Labour itself is naturally anti-war. After all, the worker is a productive person, and the worker of one country has no enmity against the worker of another country. It is not from the workers that war comes; but it is from those who seek power and dominion over people, and therefore the struggle against conscription should be a struggle of the whole working-class movement.

"The state of the world to-day, with almost the whole of humanity involved in a bloody catastrophe, with science being used for the destruction of mankind and the destruction of the degree of civilisation to which we have attained, is a very strong comment on our activity religiously, scientifically, educationally, and politically. In its early days the working-class movement recorded its unwavering opposition to war and preparation for war. Only shortly before the last war the entire Labour movement attacked Lord Roberts for his advocacy of compulsory military service. To-day the Labour Party is in unison with the National Government, and prominent Labour men are administering the conscription laws of the country.

"We must stand for a living vital individualism within our Socialism. We have got to look upon ourselves as having common social interests and requirements, each one of us an individual personality and an individual integrity, which can be taken away by no state and no church.

Speaking at the Labour Party Conference, 1944, in defence of Socialism and Peace against Vansittartism.

THE PASSPORT SYSTEM.

"The present Government is quite willing to introduce what has never been known in this country before—the perpetuation of the Identity Card system, which is purely and simply an internal passport. Not so very long ago we spoke with a superior scorn about this system as practised by continental countries such as Russia and Germany. That could never happen in Free Britain. But to-day we accept it as a war-time measure. War-time measures unfortunately have a tendency to continue long after war-time into peace-time. The internal passport must go. We must get the virus of nationalism out of our veins, in so far as it represents a jealousy of antagonism and imperialism. We have got to get rid of empire building and exploitation. Loyalty to any country does not mean the murder of the people of other countries. That is the lowest and the most contemptible concept of loyalty that one can imagine. The highest courage is moral courage. They would have us believe in mere animal courage and not in the real courage of mankind.

"What are we going to do about the working-class movement at the present time? We can divide ourselves up into small sectarian groups. That is all very well as discussion circles. We can keep our divisions and develop our divisions, but we must not overlook the need for unity in great issues which affect the whole of the workers.

Variety within unity, the ideal of art, should also be the ideal of the Socialist movement. In so far as the House of Commons can be made a sounding board, the outstanding person in the House in the opposition to war is our comrade Rhys Davies. (Cheers.) When Rhys Davies fires question after question to the Ministers responsible in the House of Commons, then I hold that it is my business to support that work. Since the ordinary press will not give him a sounding board, I'll give him a sounding board, because I approve of the work he does. (Applause.)

UNITE AGAINST WAR.

"The power of massive physical organisation at the disposal of the ruling class is tremendous. So we should try to come together, a solid movement of anti-conscription and anti-militarism with which to face them. When they conscript a man they don't bother what his religious ideas, or lack of them, may be. They would say to me, for instance, 'So you're an atheist? Right. You'll make magnificent cannon fodder. Get into the front line!' (Laughter.)

"But even some sections of the Labour Movement cannot associate with an atheist. What is to hinder us from uniting, in order to make the world a place worth while living in? We live a poverty-stricken life of misery in capitalist society. On the one side the army of ignorance, of war and destruction. On our side the living army of Socialism. As the war ends, so the Socialist movement should be re-born. The false values that are imposed upon us to-day we must get rid of. Mere resistance to war is not enough. We have to see to it that the children of to-day do not grow up only to be destroyed on the threshold of manhood. Human nature must reach its full height, and it must do so in kindness and understanding. It must do so in liberty." (Loud applause.)

SOCIALISTS AND CONSCRIPTION.

RHYS DAVIES, M.P., said: "The first thing I have to do is to thank Emrys Hughes and Guy Aldred for the Forward and The Word respectively. You have not the remotest idea what it means to us to find two well-known papers in Glasgow supporting us in our work. There is a difference in the public mind in this war from that of the war of 1914-1918. Wherever I went in those days, speaking against the war, the audiences were hostile. This time I have not had the slightest hostility from the public. What hostility and opposition I have had, has come from officialdom and the high-ups. We must remember that from the dawn of history mankind has always punished those who lived below its standard and has crucified those few who tried to live above that standard.

"We find many people to-day concerned as to whether conscription will be continued here after the end of the war. There was no conscription in this country until the last war. Up to that time Britain always said, 'One volunteer is worth three pressed men.' To-day they have conscripted mankind and they have controlled some wealth. They have conscripted none. Once you touch their wealth and the sources of their wealth you will find what powers there are arrayed against the common people. We have had a taste in this war of the meaning of industrial conscription. We have directed, we have prosecuted, we have persecuted and oppressed the people as a consequence of that Act. Up to August 31st 29,677 male workers, 8179 female workers, and 173 employers were prosecuted for offences against the Industrial Board. 4137 male workers and 371 female workers were sentenced to imprisonment. No employers were so sentenced.

"I protest against Socialists, men who come from ordinary humble homes, turning out more repressive and tyrannical measures than those from the traditional ruling classes. They are not capitalists, you know. They are not bankers or financiers or big landowners. Were it not for the fact that the Labour Party joined the Government, no Tory or Liberal would ever have dared to do this to the people of these islands. (Loud applause.) A pair of handcuffs are no easier to bear merely because the links were forged by a Labour man. Labour men have been used before as errand boys for the capitalist class, and when they had finished with them they threw them on the rubbish heap. If the Labour Movement can be used for that purpose, tell me the reason for its existence at all.

DANGER SIGNAL FOR TRADE UNIONS.

"Bevin has told us that conscription will go on after the war in Europe has ended. You don't require to pass a Bill to continue conscription. What you have got to do is to abolish the Act that now exists in order to stop the conscription of our people. The people of these islands will have to agitate and organise against the militarists, or conscription will remain for many years after the war. What do they want it for? We can't have the largest army. Our population doesn't allow of that. If you accept the policy of occupying Germany and Japan, well, conscription follows automatically. There is a general strike among parents in these islands against providing cannon fodder for the future.

"This Coalition Government has abolished the right of free contract between employer and employed. You can't work where you like. You've got to go where Bevin's men tell you. This Coalition Government has abolished the right to strike. But there are strikes, in spite of the abolition. The one thing that marks a workman out as between a slave and a free man is his right to lay down his tools when he wants to. (Applause.) I don't like the tendency within the Trade Union movement that their duty is to discipline their membership as between the state and the employers. If that attitude grows in the Trade Union leadership it will be good-bye to Trade Unionism after this war. That is exactly what happened in Italy and in Germany.

"There was recently a strike of gas-workers in Manchester, and the significant thing about that strike was that the men struck not against their employer, but against their union. If that idea of the executive and the officials bossing the membership, instead of the membership bossing the officials and the executive, grows, you will get strikes, not against the employers, but against the Trade Unions themselves. All this comes from a Coalition Government. The United States of America are at war, but there is no coalition there, nor in Australia, nor South Africa, and they are all at war. I think the present Coalition Government in this country is beginning to crumble at last. And the sooner the better. The existence of a Coalition Government fouls public life in this country. Men do things under a coalition that they wouldn't dream of doing if there was no coalition at all.

CONSCRIPTION MUST GO.

"We hear the contention that we shall need to retain conscription to occupy Germany. We also hear wonderful ideas of re-educating the German people after the war. We, who will not have anything like the teachers or the schools necessary to put into operation the provisions of the new English Education Act, have the arrogance, the conceit and the self-righteousness to talk about educating a nation of 70 million people. You can't keep a nation down. The German people were suffering injustices long before Hitler ever arrived on the scene. The crushing of Nazism and Fascism is not the real war aim of Britain and the United States. It is much nearer the truth to say that the destruction of Germany's industrial capacity, which was becoming too great a menace to them, is the objective of British and American capitalism.

"I am opposed to every war alike. Wars create more problems than they set out to solve. And never forget that wars, in capitalist countries invariably make the rich richer and the poor poorer. The struggle against conscription in these islands will not be an easy one. The militarists and the people behind them will do all they can to retain the power it gives them over the workers, but you may be sure that the employers will want to get rid of all the orders that are objectionable to them. And the workers should do the same." (Loud applause.)

SUPPORT OUR DEFICIT FUND

RHYS J. DAVIES, M.P.

IN PARLIAMENT.

On October 11, 1944, in the course of the debate on Unemployment Insurance (Increase of Benefit) Bill, our Comrade, Rhys Davies, came to grips with the question of unemployment when peace is restored.

We select a striking passage, indicting the present Anti-Socialist war coalition:—

Rhys Davies . . . . My hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Mr. Tinker) asked the Government what they were going to do about unemployment when peace is restored. What does he expect to get at the end of a disastrous war like this? What can the nation expect when it has spent its substance on war for five years, with £20,000,000,000 of debt hanging over its head?

Mr. Tinker: I expect that the resources in the country will be used for these purposes as they have been used for war purposes.

Rhys Davies: My hon. Friend is surely too intelligent to assume that the present Government will use the nation's resources as he suggests. He may remember a statement made by an eminent statesman that political parties join coalitions in ignorance and separate in disgrace. This coalition is in disgrace before the parties begin to think of separating.

On October 17 he raised the question of a new regime in Germany:—

Rhys Davies asked the Prime Minister whether he has noted the Motion on the Order Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Westhoughton urging His Majesty's Government and its Allies to make a declaration relative to a new and democratically-minded regime in Germany; and if he will arrange for a debate on that Motion.

["That this House would welcome a declaration by His Majesty's Government, in conjunction with its allies, which would encourage the emergence within Germany of a new regime composed of democratically-minded persons in whom the United Nations could have confidence, so that a settlement of the problems which caused the present conflict in Europe might be reached on the basis of the principles set forth in the Atlantic Charter."]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Attlee): The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. As regards the last part, I can hold out no hope of special facilities being given in the present Session for the discussion of the Motion standing in the name of my hon. Friend.

Rhys Davies: Is my right hon. Friend aware that a few months ago, when I tabled a Motion supported by 70 of my hon. Friends on the Atlantic Charter, the Prime Minister said then that if we were determined to challenge the Government and press it to a Division he would give us a full day's Debate? Will my right hon. Friend therefore reconsider the position when I tell him that we intend on this occasion to challenge the Government's war policy; will he, knowing that, consider giving us a day's Debate?

Mr. Attlee: My right hon. Friend's previous reply was given some time ago. We are now getting towards the end of the Session.

Mr. Petherick: Is it not the case that we tried a democratically-managed regime in Germany before, and they were just the same as the others.

Which, of course, is an argument against parliamentarism. If parliamentarism failed in Germany, as it did, it was because parliamentarism failed also in Britain and France. But Mr. Petherick has not the intellectual capacity to understand that truth.

On October 20, speaking on the Vote of Credit, Comrade Davies came to grips with the war issue and the future:—

Rhys Davies: I desire to say only a very few words to the Committee. I have listened to several Debates on Votes of Credits for many years, and I think this is almost the first occasion since the outbreak of war when I have heard anyone suggesting that the time has arrived when we ought to be critical of how much money we are spending on the conflict. That is a healthy sign indeed. The hon. Member for Wallasey (Mr. Reakes) talked about waste of expenditure; I regard all money spent on war as sheer waste; and if I had any company here to-day I would vote against this Vote of Credit in the Division Lobby. I am happy to believe that there is a growing number of people in this country who agree with the point of view I have just mentioned. The time has come at last when our people ought to be told what the total debt and the interest on that National Debt will be when the war ends.

Lieut.-Commander Braithwaite: How can anyone tell that?

Rhys Davies: We can surely get estimates. The hon. and gallant Member himself gave a figure of £700,000,000 as the annual interest. Does he mean to imply that he is more intelligent than Treasury Officials?

Lieut.-Commander Braithwaite: I am within the recollection of the Committee in that I said that if we had another winter campaign, by next April the interest on the Sinking Fund, as I had calculated it, would be £700,000. I did not predict the date when the war would end; I leave that to the astrologers of Fleet Street.

Rhys Davies: The Prime Minister said that the war would probably go into 1945, so that on the hon. and gallant Member's own showing he is not far from correct. I could not, however, understand his point about the Civil Service and the way they reply, or do not attend to his letters. He has been in this House long enough to know that if he cannot stir up a Government Department by letter he has only to put a question on the Order Paper to move it to action.

Lieut.-Commander Braithwaite: It would never be reached.

Rhys Davies: As I have said our people must face up to the economic consequences of the war, and the state of our finances when it ends. The expenditure that we are passing to-day is of course simply mortgaging the future labour power of the people of the country. It cannot be otherwise.

Sir Irving Albery (Gravesend): The hon. Member's party do not agree with that view.

Rhys Davies: That is my own view. The House of Commons is a place designed for people to speak their own minds. If we all said the same thing we would not need a Parliament at all. The House of Commons is always tolerant on this issue. What annoys me is the easy way Members of Parliament grant these huge sums of money to the Government. The last war destroyed one-half of our coal industry, never to recover, and it destroyed also one-half of the Lancashire textile industry, never to recover. This war, I am told, has sent 50 per cent. of our merchant shipping to the bottom of the sea. Then we are told we cannot secure the same standard of life after the war as we enjoyed in 1938 unless we export 50 per cent. more than we did in 1938. I think therefore that those who make glowing promises about a higher standard of life after the war are deceiving themselves and the people, and are living in a fool's paradise.

Incidentally, the question has often been put to me: How comes it that the Prime Minister goes twice to America and twice to Russia, when Great Britain is half-way between the two countries? That question is asked by many people. Why do not Stalin and Roosevelt come here for a change? Let me say what I think will happen at the end of the war. The assumption is that we shall march into Berlin, occupy Germany and keep all the Germans in submission for a decade at least. For what it is worth my view is that what Great Britain and America are doing from now onwards is to make Europe safe for Communism. It does not matter how much money we spend unless we change our attitude of mind towards the war. We ought to give some hope to the people of Germany who are opposed to Hitler and tell them to rise above the din of battle and help to make peace between the nations of Europe. The mere spending of money on war in itself is not enough; we ought to use our reason.

It is a disgraceful fact that the so-called parliamentary Socialist press should ignore the splendid and consistent struggle our Comrade, Rhys Davies, is making to use the House of Commons as a sounding-board. His voice is that of humanity, commonsense and Socialism. Since the parliamentarians do not assist his stand, the anti-parliamentary press ought to rally to his support. Comrade Davies ought to command the united backing of the entire Socialist movement at this time of crisis and grave peril to working-class struggle and the future of civilisation.

GLASGOW SECULAR SOCIETY.

Our Comrade, F. J. Corina, defender and champion of modern youth, who vigorously opposes the charges of "moral decadence" so frequently laid against young people to-day, will speak at the Cosmo Cinema, Glasgow, on Sunday, February 4th, at 2-30 p.m., under the auspices of the Glasgow Secular Society. His subject will be "The Moral Landslide."

Comrade Corina is the author of a booklet called "The Moral Landslide," in which he defends youth from the charges made against them by the churches, and he has also written a book, "We Are Sixteen," in which he not only explains to young people the reasons for the decadent sex outlook of many older people, but deals specially with sex questions for the benefit of those young people—and they are many—who need enlightenment and information.

SEDITIOUS MEETINGS BILL

SPEECH DELIVERED By FRANCIS, DUKE OF BEDFORD

(Culled from the Official Parliamentary Reports.)

HOUSE OF LORDS, DECEMBER 14, 1795.

The Duke of Bedford said:

The Bill, my Lords, now stands before you exactly as it is to pass into law. In the course of the discussion which it has undergone; it has been divested of several obnoxious clauses. The exceptionable principle, however, still remains. No one denies that it imposes some restrictions on the right of petitioning. The Bill gives a power which is liable to abuse, it is in vain to tell me that it will not be abused. I never will confide such a power while I am ignorant for what purposes it may be applied. The ground urged for adopting this Bill has been the outrage against his Majesty's person. It has been boldly asserted that, previous to that event, the propagation of sedition was notorious and that it may be immediately traced to doctrines which were openly preached. I, as boldly, contradict the assertion. Upon that point, therefore, we are at issue. How, then, is it to be established? By proof; by investigation. These have been refused; and ministers did well to refuse them: for they were aware that their measures were not calculated to stand such a test. Had they been in possession of those proofs which we required, would they have refused them? If the circumstances of the times imposed upon them the necessity of bringing forward new acts of restriction, and of making fresh additions to the penal code of the country, would they not, if possible, have endeavoured to secure our concurrence? The present measure is liable to be grossly abused, and, I am afraid, with impunity.

I do not wish to enter into any invectives against the characters of magistrates; it is not, however, to be concealed that many of those to whom so large a power is to be given by the present Bill are known to be corrupt and interested men. And to persons of this description you give the power to arrest an Englishman while he is speaking. And in case of any resistance or obstruction, what is the power you give to the magistrate? And to disperse the meeting, to enforce military execution; and remark how many kinds of obstruction may take place in a large assembly short of actual violence; for it is not to be expected that Englishmen will, on the first mandate of a corrupt and worthless magistrate disperse like a troop of slaves. Yet in every such instance you put it in the power of a magistrate of this description to enforce the most severe penalties wherever the British spirit shall either undauntedly step forward in the arduous task of asserting it's outraged rights, or tempering it's energies with prudence, shall calmly remain on the defensive, and assume the inflexible, but unoffending attitude of opposition to caprice or tyranny.

With such a power I would not trust the man whom I most loved. To such a man I might trust my own life, liberty and property; but not those of my countrymen. I feel that, though I am not delegated from them, I am delegated for them.

With respect to the outrage upon his majesty, what did the evidence brought forward go to prove? That the persons any way implicated in that outrage were very few in number. It seemed to be the wish of ministers to prove that the outrage was entirely the act of a band of ruffians.

Supposing that to be the fact was it fitting to enslave the whole people of England for the offence of a few desperate individuals? Was their guilt a justification of those new and cruel punishments which were enacted by this Bill?

The Bill is defended as a measure of prevention. This argument for increasing the penal code, in order to prevent crimes, is founded on a most despotic principle, and is an innovation of the most dangerous nature. It is contrary to that spirit which guided the legislative proceedings of our ancestors, contrary to the whole tenour of our laws.

It is to be recollected that laws, in order to be just, ought to fall equally upon all ranks of the community. The present Bill is chiefly calculated to restrain the lower orders; and it will become the House to recollect the relative situation in which they stand to that class of society. We may be well said to fatten by the sweat of their brows. To them we are indebted, not immediately, indeed, for the situation we hold here, but for all those appendages which render that situation desirable; riches, honours and power. They can do without us; we cannot do without them.

Wherever an apology has been wanted for the bill, it has been said: "Look to the example of France."

The case of the French and of the English is materially different. The French have for centuries been doomed to bend beneath the yoke of oppression; they have been accustomed to witness the profligacy and extravagance of their court, and to consider depravity of morals as a necessary qualification for honours and preferment. Englishmen, on the contrary, have at different periods struggled boldly and gallantly for liberty, and if occasionally they have been forced to submit, they have again burst their chains, and loaded them upon their oppressors. Such has been, such, I trust, ever will be the independence of the English spirit, and the energy of the English character.

What has the example of France held out, but a solemn warning of the fatal consequences that a revolution brought on by tyranny and oppression, was certain to produce. The French, under their revolution have committed every species of horror and excess. What does this prove? Only that, in proportion as the people are the enslaved and oppressed, the less will they be qualified to enjoy, and the more strongly will they be tempted to abuse, the advantages of newly-recovered freedom.

What, on the other hand, has been the treatment of the people of this country? They have submitted to a calamitous war with patience and resignation.

How were they induced to submit in patience and bear its evils without repining? They were told that it was a war carried on for the sake of liberty, for the preservation of their free constitution. That one thing most dear to them, for which they had made so many sacrifices, you are now about to assassinate.

The present measure I most decidedly regard as a violation of the rights of the constitution, established at the Revolution.

There is one other topic on which I wish to say a few words, namely, the right to resistance. No one now stands up to defend the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance. It is universally admitted that there is a certain degree of oppression which men may justifiably resist, and when to submit is no longer a question of moral duty. If it had fallen to my share to have debated this Bill at the commencement, and as it was originally brought forward, I should not have hesitated to have declared, as was done by some valued friends of mine, that if the Bill should be carried into a law and executed to its extent, resistance would then be declined from motives of prudence and not of duty.

I oppose this Bill from principle, I oppose it from the precedent which it affords for future innovation; from the example which it establishes, that Parliament have a right to violate those laws which were settled at the Revolution, and on which the Parliament then declared that they did demand and insist. In support of those principles, my ancestors shed their blood, and rather than desert or betray them, I will submit to perish.

THE "ANARCHIST" "THIRD FRONT."

Last month we published the letter of the editor of the New York Yiddish "Freie Arbeiter Stimme," addressed to our comrade Berkingoff. Editor Frank disapproves of our attacks on Rocker and Kropotkin. So he refers to us as "the friend of Lords and Dukes." This is very poor abuse. It does not answer the indictment. If we must go into personalities, we wonder how editor Frank's record for imprisonment, as an Anti-Militarist in war-time, and a political offender in peace-time, compares with our record. We know that Rocker's record does not compare at all. Even Kropotkin's falls short. Perhaps our "Anarchist" apologist should develop a wide originality in his mode of defence. Abuse must be efficient to be even abuse. The unpardonable offence, when one becomes abusive, is to be ineffectual.

Our friend is driven, in defence of Rocker and Kropotkin, to oppose Socialism to Pacifism. We have never identified the two philosophies, although we believe that they tend to merge. In "At Grips With War," first edition published in 1929, we stated at some length, the revolutionary Socialist case against mere Pacifism. Our critic is not original.

Having urged this distinction, he blandly informs us that Anarchists believe in "the third front," which is most interesting. But what is the "Anarchist Third Front?"

Anarchists are opposed to Fascism. Very good. They are opposed to Allied Imperialism. Again, very good: although Rocker's recent writings do not suggest such opposition. On the contrary, he defends and applauds British Imperialism. Let it be accepted, however, that "the Anarchist Third Front" is opposed to Allied Imperialism. How does it function?

Do the "Anarchist Third Fronters" enlist in the conscript armies of capitalist democracy?

Do the "Anarchist Third Fronters" take their stand against conscription as conscientious objectors?

These are fair questions. They require direct answers. How do the "Anarchist Third Fronters" function?

If the editor of our contemporary wishes us to believe that Kropotkin was an "Anarchist Third Fronter," then it is very easy to decide what the Third Front means. "The Anarchist Third Front" means Vansittartism.

When the war of 1914-18 broke out Kropotkin rallied to the Czar's cause. Rocker denounced him for so doing. When the war liquidated itself in the Russian Revolution, Kropotkin returned to Moscow to denounce the Bolsheviks for their Anti-Militarism and to identify the Revolution with Anti-German Militarism. His "Anarchist Third Front" was a continued capitalist war.

So we ask, in all sincerity, in simple, direct words: What is meant by this "Anarchist Third Front?" We request a simple, direct, non-abusive answer. If we do not receive such an answer, we shall not be disappointed. We request but we do not expect to receive.

To assist understanding, let us define Kropotkin's position. It will do his reputation no harm with the militarists. It will enhance it in militarist and ruling class circles. Let it not be said that we are slandering him.

In our October issue (page 29, column 2) we referred at length to "The Birth of Russian Democracy," by A. J. Sack, published in New York, in 1918.

Chapter VII of this excellent work reproduces the speech made by Professor Miliukov, Minister of Foreign Affairs, in the First Provisional Government, in the Duma, on May 17, 1917, immediately after his resignation.

Miliukov denounced the peace proposals and anti-war propaganda then being advanced by the Bolsheviks, who appealed to the common people as an anti-war faction. Miliukov (sometimes spelt Milyoukov) insisted on the continuation of the war against Germany.

Thus, there was no diplomacy of the Tsar, but a diplomacy of the Allies, and we are bound with our Allies, whether for sorrow or for joy, and we are mostly obliged to stay with them to the end. . . .

For a considerable length of time I thought that my foreign policy was completely approved by my fellow-members of the Provisional Government.

But after some time it became evident that another theory had been brought in from the outside, a theory based on the opinion of foreign Socialists, who, before the outbreak of war, had decided to prevent it, and after the war began, had sought to stop it. According to these people, the war was started by Capitalists, its aims were imperialistic, the tasks of the proletariat were, therefore, to force their respective governments to stop the war. This programme was rather difficult, because it was adopted abroad by only a small minority of Social-Democrats. The majority of the Socialists in all the Allied countries proved materialistic and not international, that is, they adhered to the idea of the country's defense and of war against the German militarism which alone prevented a lasting peace. The bourgeois parties adhered to this nationalistic point of view even more. And it seemed that nothing would happen in Russia to change this general situation.

But the ideas of Zimmerwald and Kinthal shared abroad by a very small group have developed into a powerful surrent in our country, where they are responsible for the made-in-Germany formula brought to us through the Swiss Socialists and our own exiles, who, upon their return to Russia, began an energetic agitation in favour of the Zimmerwald ideas.

In a footnote to his speech, Sack says:—

Zimmerwald and Kinthal are the places in Switzerland where two conferences of the Socialist-Internationalists were held during this war. These "Internationalists" do not entirely share the point of view of the Bolsheviki, but have very much in common with them.

Actually, of course, Lenin stood for the Zimmerwald ideas and adopted a bold Socialist Anti-Militarist policy and programme of "Peace and Bread." It cannot be said that he stood for freedom.

On June 22, 1917, a verbal duel took place between Lenin and Kerensky before the All-Russian Congress of Workmen's and Soldiers' delegates. Then came the great crisis and the resignation of Prince Lvov as Prime Minister of the Second Revolutionary Government. Kerensky became Prime Minister of the Third Provisional Government.

On July 25, the Bolsheviks were accused of being in the pay of Germany, in a resolution adopted by the Executive Committee of the All-Russian Councils of Workmen's, Soldiers, and Peasants' Delegates, by the overwhelming majority of 300 to 11. The resolution demanded that Lenin and Zinoviev, who had escaped arrest and were in hiding, appear for public trial.

We quote the first recommendation of this resolution:—

The whole Revolutionary Democracy desires that the group of Bolsheviki accused of having organised disorders or incited revolt or of having received money from German sources be tried publicly. In consequence, the Executive Committee considers it absolutely inadmissible that Lenin and Zinoviev should escape justice, and demands that the Bolshevik faction immediately express its censure of the conduct of its leaders.

The present pro-war Communist Party should recall this censure of Lenin.

The disintegration of the Army continued. Consequently the Provisional Government convoked an extraordinary National Conference, which met in Moscow on August 26, 1917. This Conference consisted of 2,416 Delegates, representing the 4 Dumas, the Peasants, the Councils of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, the Municipalities, the Union of Zemstvos and Towns, Industries and Banks, the Co-operative organisations, and the Trade Unions. The purpose of the Conference was to give expression to the various voices in Russia's political life and so to evolve a concrete political programme of action.

The Conference was opened in the Moscow Grand Theatre by Premier A. F. Kerensky. To boisterous applause, he attacked the decomposing influences at work in the Army, and denounced Bolshevism. He promised to deal with the "lawlessness with an iron hand."

Speeches followed by Avksentiev, Prokopovich, Nekrasov, representatives of the First, Second, and Third Duma; General Kornilov, then Commander-in-Chief of the Russian Armies; General Kaledine, who spoke on behalf of the Cossacks; N. S. Tschiedze, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the All-Russian Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates; Martiushin, Krondratiev, and Ponomarev, who spoke in the name of Peasants' Delegates and the Peasants' Union; and A. I. Guchov, the former Secretary of State for War.

The next day, August 27, I. G. Tseretelli debated with V. A. Maklakov. Tsertelli was replied to also by A. A. Boublikov(former Commissaire of the Drama.

The third day Kropotkin spoke.

Says Sack (page 4, 65):—

At the session of August 28, most outstanding were the speeches of the veterans of the Russian Revolution, E. C. Breshko-Breshkovskaya, Peter Kropotkin, and George Plekhanov. The audience stood up as one man when A. F. Kerensky mentioned their names.

Breshko-Breshkovskaya spoke first. Her speech was strongly militarist and patriotic, in the war-sense.

She was followed by Kropotkin.

Kropotkin's speech is reported by Sack, on pages 466: we reproduce the report:—

PETER KROPOTKIN'S SPEECH

"Allow me also to add my voice to those voices which have called the whole Russian people to break once and forever with Zimmerwaldism and to rise together, closely united, in defense of the Fatherland and the Revolution (Applause). In my opinion, the Fatherland and the Revolution are indivisible. The Fatherland made the Revolution and it must carry the latter to the end. Citizens, we are in a protracted war, the most terrible months of which are the last months. Why, during these last months, has not the question been decided as to who shall conquer and who shall be defeated? If the Germans should be victorious, the consequences would be so dreadful for us that it is simply painful to speak of or prophesy such things."

Kropotkin spoke of the territorial loss and indemnity in the event of German victory and continued:

"But there is something even worse than that. There is the psychology of a vanquished country. (Voices: "Right! Correct!"). The psychology of a defeated ocuntry I learned by living in France. I am not a Frenchman, but I became intimate with them and my heart pained when I saw how France humiliated herself before Alexander and Nicholas, the French Republic degraded itself before a General Boulanger, because she felt herself so badly defeated that she resorted to any means to liberate herself from this defeat. Is it possible that we also shall have to live through this? Never! (Applause of the whole assembly).

Comrades, Soldiers, look how the Italians, at this dangerous moment, fighting in a terrain so dreadful, with mountains on which every gun must be dragged up an inclined plane of 45 degrees, fighting under these conditions, are gaining victories. And why are they so anxious to be victorious at the present moment? In order to relieve us in Roumania, in Odessa, on which the Austrian army is advancing. Follow their example, comrades! (Applause from the Right. Voices: "Long live the Italians!" Noise).

Comrades, citizens, the war is one thing and the work in the rear another thing—however, an important thing. Repressive measures, in this case, will get us nowhere. Something else is needed; it is necessary that the great mass of the Russian people should understand and see that a new era is approaching, an era that will give the whole people the opportunity to obtain education, to live not in that terrible, horrifying poverty and squalor in which the Russian people have lived up till now and lived at all times,—even at the time when it is earning millions, as it is said, in Petrograd. It is necessary that the Russian people should understand that we are doing everything to improve the conditions of their life and open for them the gates to light, freedom and education. (Applause from the Right):

Allow me, citizens and comrades, to call you to this creative work. Some one spoke here of how inexperienced our Democracy is. True, we are all inexperienced.

Gentlemen, you have—I am not speaking of your capital—you have something that is more important than capital,—the knowledge of life. You know life, you know commerce, you know the manufacturing industry; give us, then, your knowledge; add to the energy of the committees and councils, combine the former with the latter and apply them to the upbuilding of the new life. The new life we must have. (Shouts: "Bravo!" Boisterous applause.) In Petrograd we have lines in which the wives of workmen have to stand two, three, four and five hours in order to obtain bread and a little milk for their hungry children. Is that organization? Where then are you, city heads and organizers of the municipal economy, that you can't regulate it? Isn't that your duty, your sacred duty?

I must not take up much of your time, but I will speak of one thing more. It seems to me that it would be proper for us here, at this assembly of the Russian land, to state our firm desire that Russia be openly declared a republic. (Shouts: "Right!" All rise; boisterous applause culminating in an ovation.) And, citizens, the republic must be a federated one, in the sense in which we see it in the United States, where every state has its own legislative bodies, these legislative bodies deciding all the interior problems, while the Republic in all its decisions needs the consent of several States or of all the States.

And you know how they stood up together when it became necessary to play the forces of the Democracies against the base Austro-German monarchy. (Noise and boisterous applause.) I think that it is not without reason that all the Democracies of the whole world have united against Germany, and even the Democracy of China has joined and will help us worthily. And so I think we shall not be encroaching upon the rights of the Constituent Assembly. I fully recognize that the sovereign decision of such a question should be left to the Constituent Assembly. But it seems to me that if this assembly were to approve our desire that Russia be declared a republic, we would thus have facilitated the work of the Constituent Assembly, and all the peoples of all Europe and America would be thankful to us ("Right!" Thundering applause.)

Comrades, let us promise each other that we will not stand divided into the Right and the Left. (Boisterous applause). We have but one Fatherland, and for the whole of it we must all be ready to die, the conservative and the radical." (Thundering applause, culminating in an ovation).

Why do the Anarchists, in their references to Kropotkin, make no reference to this speech?

On the speech itself we make no lengthy comment. It could have been delivered by Lord Vansittart to his militarist admirers in the House of Lords. It certainly is not Anarchism. But Editor Frank, of the "Freie Arbeiter Stimme," declares that we have no right to say that the author of this speech is not an Anarchist. He defends the man and his speech by referring to the "Anarchist Third Front," the unity of the conservative and the radical in war, dying for the one Fatherland—and killing for it as well? If so, why sneer at us for being united with "Lords and Dukes"? After all, that, at the very worst, can be only the unity of the conservative and the radical. Is it not as right to have "one Fatherland" or Motherland for Peace as for war? Or must we unite only to murder? Is the glory of death the ideal of "the Anarchist Third Front"?

After the Revolution of March, 1917, Kropotkin returned to Russia. He was met with great honours, as one of the foremost fighters for liberty and democracy. As a sincere democrat, he has taken the only stand possible in this great war: with the Allied democracies—against the autocracy of Germany. Although a philosophical anarchist, in theory repudiating every State organization, he makes a definite distinction between a democratic State and an autocratic State, and in the present conflict, naturally, wishes success to the union of democratic nations.

"An Anarchist in theory" but a militarist in crisis and in practice!

We accuse Kropotkin, this "Anarchist in theory," of being an enemy of Socialism and Anarchism. We condemn him on his own words and his war-exciting record. We accuse him of supporting the measures for the arrest of Lenin and Zinoviev on the charge of Zimmerwaldism, that is, urging Socialist Revolutionary Peace as opposed to war.

Just as we hold that Stalin and Stalinism, and present-day war "Communism" and State balance of power politics are wrong, so we hold that Lenin's "Socialism and Peace" campaign was right. Kropotkin ranks with Stalin in this matter. We stand by Lenin. And we avow that the "Anarchist Third Front" is merely a glib phrase defining the position of those persons who have not the courage to resist militarism in time of war, but like to pose as anti-militarists in time of peace. They are not Anarchists. They are charlatans.

THE SNARE OF PEDIGREE.

By Rev. J. H. DALE.

The following is a summary of an address given on the National Day of Prayer, September 3rd, 1944.

No people has been prouder of its ancestry than have the Jews. The fact that it believed in its selection by God to fulfil a special role was its constant glory and boast. Yet, as so often happens when the spirit of nationalism becomes suddenly pronounced, it was this very habit of excessive pride, and the attitude of superiority to which it gave rise, that ultimately led to the nation's downfall.

The effect which this extreme concern for national pedigree had produced in the minds and upon the life of the people is clearly seen in the words of stern denunciation John the Baptist poured out upon them. So vainglorious had they become that they were pinning the whole of their faith to the fact of their national history and descent from Abraham, without any reference whatever to such matters as personal righteousness and moral and spiritual responsibility. Pride in a long record of privilege made them indifferent to higher obligations.

It was necessary, therefore, that they should be reminded of the stern truth that their descent from the patriarchs, however attractive such lineage might appear to be, was but a small thing in comparison with the duty they owed to God and their fellows.

But, however susceptible the Jews were to this glorification of their historical record, they were by no means alone. They have had many imitators. Ever and again through the centuries there have arisen peoples possessed of this exaggerated idea regarding the importance of the place they filled in the historical development of the race. The tremendous harm it has done is written plainly upon the story of the past, if only we had eyes to see. The false valuation a nation can put upon its place and function can constitute a very formidable hindrance to the real advance of mankind towards truer levels of life—especially if that nation occupies a position of outstanding influence and power.

The sooner we dispossess our minds of the mischievous and unchristian idea that God has favourites the better. No individual and no nation can claim to fill a position of exclusive privilege in relationship to God. There may be, and certainly are, both individuals and peoples who occupy favoured positions by reason of the natural, cultural and spiritual advantages they enjoy. But such are not the consequence of exclusive favour. They are the result of the development and interplay of many and various forces through a long period of time. These advantages, instead of being a cause for boasting, should rather be thought of as calling for deep humility and much searching of heart.

It was against the powerful and privileged nations that the prophets of old spoke their terrific words of divine condemnation. And foremost among them was Israel itself. Listen to the words of Amos! "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities." Little favouritism there, despite Israel's favoured position.

What is largely at the root of the present world upheaval, the chief cause of repeated war? Is it not this excessive concern for national and imperial sovereignty and prestige, a fixed determination to retain the power bequeathed by the past? Perhaps we are too much inclined to ignore the fact that there is just as much sin of aggression in maintaining possession of territory and rights gained by wrongful means as there is in seeking to acquire them by such methods. To assert that things have changed in recent years, and a new international code is in force, is nothing but sheer hypocrisy, and lays those guilty of it open to the condemnation which Nathan pronounced on David.

The great need to-day is not for pride but for penitence and confession. The reason why I find it impossible to join with others in praying for victory is not only because I am strongly convinced that war is absolutely contrary to the mind and spirit of God as revealed in Jesus Christ, but also because I am equally certain that victory to either side will never bring either the peace or the happiness many fondly hope.

Only one thing can do this. Until there is renunciation of national pride and power, no way of permanent peace and lasting good for mankind will open. Nothing is more certain than that God is waiting to give the nations of the earth deliverance from their fear and tyranny and aggression. But it must be on His own terms. With both individuals and nations the conditions are the same. Pardon and release from the bondage in which men are held will come when they are prepared to acknowledge their failure, disobedience, sin.

To-day is a day of prayer and thanksgiving. That there will be much rejoicing over recent military success, I have no doubt. I wonder how much confession of our own sin and complicity in bringing about the present state of affairs there will be. Unfortunately the majority of folk suffer from very short memories. They would be very surprised were they reminded of certain facts.

As a nation pride has long been one of our most harmful traits. Class privilege has been one of the most detrimental and destructive forces in preventing real social progress. Glorying in our achievements of world conquest and control, we have sadly failed to "bring forth fruits worthy of repentance." The only victory which will do that is the victory of God's Spirit over our carnal, proud and selfish natures.

How fully has our Lord's warning to the people of His day been exemplified through the years. One after another have empires and nations been broken in pride by reason of their failure to give priority of place to the eternal principles of the divine law and order.

There were some present at that season which told Him of the Galileans whose blood Pilate had mingled with the sacrifices. And He answered and said unto them, Think ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they have suffered these things? I tell you that; but, except ye repent, ye shall all in like manner perish. Or those eighteen upon whom the tower of Siloam fell, and killed them: think ye that they were offenders above all men that dwell in Jerusalem? I tell you, that; but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

To us as a people is being given the supreme opportunity of all time. We can change the whole course of history. Shall we rise to our God-given opportunity??

Even now is the axe also laid to the root of the trees: every tree therefore that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire.

CONCERNING THE EDITOR

There was naturally a crowded court this morning (writes a "Star" representative) when the Lord Chief Justice commenced the trial of Edward Fred Mylius on the charge of publishing libels on the King on 29 Nov. and 19 Dec., 1910.

The proceding by information is so rare in modern times that the members of the junior Bar were much in evidence as students of our Constitutional law and its more recondite processes. . . .

Just before the Lord Chief Justice took his seat, the Attorney-General (Sir Rufus Isaacs) and the Solicitor-General (Sir John Simon) came in through the dense crowd of jurymen and spectators who filled the passages of the court. With them came Mr. Churchill—at home one day in the battle with the Anarchists at Sidney-st., and on the next in the prosecution of assailants of the Royal House in the Law Courts.

The Public Prosecutor (Sir Charles Matthews) was there, and Mr. Superintendent Quinn, of the C.I.D., who knows all the languages of the revolt, from Lithuania to Connemara, and is the one really "Constant Reader" on whom some revolutionary journals can always depend.

The defendant, the centre of all this picture, sat at the solicitors' table on the opposite side of the central gangway to the Attorney-General, and between him and the jury. . . .

He was not represented by counsel or solicitors . . .

Before the jury were sworn the judge promptly brushed aside two applications by the defendant—one for the attendance of the King as prosecutor. . . . The defendant . . . had the opportunity subsequently of hearing . . . read by Sir Rufus Isaacs in his address to the jury . . . letters from Mr. Edward Holton James, a wealthy American residing in Paris, who issues "The Liberator," to Mr. Mylius, to whom he was introduced by the famous Indian, Mr. Krishnavarma. . . . Mr. James, by the way, stated that the defendant was an intimate friend of Mr. Guy Aldred.

This intimacy with Aldred was stressed by Isaacs in his address to the Court, and became a feature of the case. It became an insinuation against Aldred and pictured him as libeller rather than a propagandist. All this without adducing a single suggestion of fact in support.

The King incident was reported as follows :—

The Defendant: I wish to ask whether the King is present, and I demand his presence here.

Defendant gave his reasons: "Firstly, because every accused person has the right to be confronted by his accuser; secondly, that in an action for libel the prosecutor must be in court, that the defendant might see him; and, thirdly, that there is no proof that the prosecutor is at present alive."

The Lord Chief Justice: This has already been the subject of an application before me, and you are perfectly aware that the King cannot be summoned here. (To the Usher): Now, then, have you the names of the jury?

Mylius was right in this demand. Judge and prosecutors were wrong. Denial of this justice, although it in no way exonerated Mylius, rendered the proceedings against him invalid and a farce in law.

After his release from prison, Mylius found it impossible to secure employment and decided to emigrate to the United States. Scotland Yard cabled the U.S. Department of Justice and urged that Mylius should not be admitted to the United States on the ground that, as a libeller of the King, he was a person of moral turpitude. In writing, the Department was warned of his association with Aldred. Actually, there was no political association with Aldred. The statement was fiction on the part of the Special Branch of Scotland Yard.

United States Socialists, Anarchists, Radicals and Liberals made a great fight for the admission of Mylius to U.S.A. The Supreme Court ruled in his favour against the Department of Justice and the Immigration Board. Mylius was admitted and made his first speech in the United States to a large and enthusiastic gathering at the Headquarters of Branch 5 of the Socialist Party, in New York, on March 2, 1913. Subsequently, he published an interesting pamphlet, entitled The Socialization of Money, which merits wide circulation. It exposed very thoroughly and very ably the Money Trust and explained commercial depression and the failure of the gold standard to function.

Mylius drifted into the I.W.W., and from that, into obscurity. He quarrelled his way out of the movement and became filled with disgust.

In August 1912, the Glasgow Clarion Scouts invited Aldred to conduct an Anarchist-Socialist campaign under their auspices. The Scouts gave him a free platform and loyal and enthusiastic support. As a result of this activity the Glasgow Communist Group was formed. Aldred conducted Communist and Anarchist propaganda throughout Lanarkshire, Fifeshire, and reached into Dundee and Aberdeen. Groups were built and headquarters established. This work was destroyed after the Bolshevik Revolution through the organisation of the worthless Communist Party. Aldred, with his Glasgow comrades, conceived the idea of establishing the Bakunin Press in Glasgow as well as in London. This publishing organisation he had founded in 1906, and it took him six years to spread its literature to Scotland. After various adventures, the Press was established at the former College Liberal and Radical Rooms at 13 Burnbank Gardens in 1917. In May 1920 this centre was renamed Bakunin House. Owing mostly to poverty, this centre was vacated in May 1933. For 16 years it had been a centre of thought and struggle.

The history of Bakunin House and the Glasgow Anti-Parliamentary movement is detailed in Socialism and Parliament, Pt. I., Appendix VI., p. 75.

Throughout the peace interlude between World War I. (1914-18) and World War II. (1939—), whilst the Communist Party was intriguing to dominate the working-class movement, forming bogus anti-war movements, organising false hunger marchings, etc., Aldred stood in opposition to the Third International intrigue on the program that he defined for himself early in 1907, of uncompromising revolutionary Communism. He held that he did not need to receive certificates of credit from Moscow to give him the right or the power to propagate his opinions. His conclusions are based on reason not authority, and the conviction that, finally, expediency must yield to principle, and compromise surrender to the stern logic of fact. The motto that he adopted from Channing in 1904 remains his watchword :

"Wait not to be backed by numbers. Wait not till you are sure of an echo from the crowd. The fewer the voices on the side of truth, the more distinct and clear must be your own."

Aldred's resistance to the Military Service Acts was complicated by his Anarchist attitude towards marriage. He set up housekeeping at 103 Thorpebank Road, Shepherd's Bush, on January 7, 1908, with his comrade Rose Witcop. Prior to that she had been an active member of the Yiddish Anarchist Club, in Jubilee Street, Mile End, and had joined the Communist Propaganda Groups Aldred organised in 1907. Although there was no legal bar to a registered marriage, both parties were opposed to registration. Also, as strong believers in the social, legal, and political equality of sexes, they objected to the woman losing her identity in mating and taking the man's name. In 1912, when Rose Witcop visited Glasgow in company with Aldred, he declared that his mating was an irregular marriage according to Scots Law and that he recognised it as such. Whilst maintaining this in 1916, at the time of his resistance to militarism, he insisted on the union being regarded as an unregistered and free mating, an irregular marriage. He was quite prepared to rank as a single man for the purpose of military conscription and resistance, but insisted on the union being recognised, since he was afraid of his companion being deported to Russia. She was born at Kiev on April 9, 1890, and had been brought to England when she was five years of age. Technically, she was a Russian subject. How justified was this fear later events proved. The matter caused much discussion in the English press at the time and was dealt with thoroughly in The Spur during 1916 to 1917.

Sylvia Pankhurst stated the position very clearly in the Woman's Dreadnought, for April 22, 1916, when she wrote :—

Whether Mr. Aldred is, or is not, legally married according to the law of this country does not appear to us to be material. The position is that he has a wife of eight years' standing and the Government, by agreeing to make separation allowance to unmarried wives and their children on the same basis as though a legal marriage had been contracted has recognised the fact that it is the relationship that should govern this question, not the legal formalities.

On July 29, 1916, Milly Witcop—Rose Witcop's eldest sister—was arrested at her home in Dunstan Houses, Stepney Green, while in the act of cooking her dinner. Her companion or husband, Rudolf Rocker, was interned as an enemy alien on the outbreak of war, despite Labour, Socialist, and Trade Union protest on his behalf, and the fact that he was a refugee from Germany and opposed to Kaiserism. Rocker told the story of his internment and Milly Witcop's treatment in a book that he published in Berlin in 1925, entitled Hinter Stacheldraht und Gitter (Behind Barbed Wire and Prison Bars).

Milly Witcop was detained at Vine Street Police Station for six days without being informed why she was arrested. She was removed to Holloway Prison and treated as a dangerous criminal. She was not allowed to see her friends. On Monday, August 28, she was brought before the Internment Committee at Westminster Hall. The proceedings were strictly private. She was allowed no opportunity of knowing the charges that would be made against her. She was accused of associating with Anarchists and Pacifist Socialists. One of the Committee named Guy Aldred and asked her to explain this association. They stressed the "fact," to them, that Aldred was "a dangerous person" and no one associating with him ought to be at large. It should have been obvious to any decent-minded person that some family or domestic association must exist, and that such relationship implied no political association in itself. Milly Witcop was in no way responsible for the relationship. There was no political association and no intimacy of the kind implied by the Committee. The internment was pure victimisation. Aldred's name ought not to have been used in the matter.

At the time of her arrest Milly Witcop had resided in London for over 20 years, as a Russian refugee. She was arrested at the time that Russian refugees were being arrested throughout the country at the request of the Czar's Government. After being before the Advisory Committee she was removed from Holloway to Aylesbury Prison.

On September 20, 1917, after an internment of fourteen months, Milly Witcop was called before a second Advisory Committee. Reference was made again to Aldred and she was told that in view of that association she could not be released. But she would be allowed to go to Russia. She refused to go without Rocker and their son. No one seems to have commented, at this stage, on the absolute injustice of deporting, without reason, a person who had lived in London continuously for twenty years, and whose interests were entirely English, despite her international outlook.

On October 17, 1917, both Rudolf Rocker and Milly Witcop were called before the Committee and informed that it would be recommended to the Government that they should both go to Russia.

Another three months passed. The new Russian Government was prepared to accept both Rocker and Milly Witcop. The British Government refused to allow Rocker to go to Russia. Milly Witcop was informed that she must go to Russia unaccompanied by Rocker. As events have shown, it was as well that the British Government was opposed to the Russian deportation. The well-being of the victims was not the intention of the British Government. That was an unforeseen and unknowable accident.

Rocker was arrested for internment immediately after he repudiated Kropotkin's pro-war Anarchism, in a powerful article that he published in the Yiddish Workers' Friend. For some time he was interned on a boat, anchored at Southend. Subsequently he was removed to Aleaxndra Palace in North London. He became leader of his battalion, but refused to accept any privileges.

Despairing of release, despite the Labour agitation on his behalf, he asked, early in 1918, to be deported to Holland. The Government agreed but actually put his name on the list for Germany. He was deported duly, despite his protests and his long residence in London, and the fact that he had lost his German citizenship. He was forced to continue the journey to Germany but jumped from the moving train two hours after leaving Rotterdam, and when near the German border. Dutch Guards arrested him and handed him over to a German officer. He was questioned and answered frankly. His frankness impressed the German officer, who reported his case to Berlin. He was kept in prison three weeks awaiting the official decision. The German authorities declared that he had lost his German nationality 17 years before and that he was a man without a country. He was put across the Dutch frontier and the Dutch Government decided to grant him political asylum. The full story was recorded in The Spur in July 1918.

On Wednesday, October 2, 1918, Milly Witcop was released without warning. She was informed that she could not be allowed to remain free in England but that the Dutch Government had opened its doors to her. She was brought to London under police escort to meet her young son, Firmin, the next day, and embarked at Gravesend for Holland, to join her companion, Rudolf Rocker. The joy of being free was sobered by the pain of having to part at once from her friends and comrades.

Which only shows how unwise it was to be associated with Guy Aldred in those stirring days.

Musing on this treatment of Rudolf Rocker and Milly Witcop, and the authorities' argument based on an abuse of Milly Witcop's relationship to him, caused Aldred to oppose the 18B internments in 1940. The internment of real or alleged Fascists in 1940, without charge or trial, indefinitely, was in the same category, in his eyes, as these Anarchist-Pacifist internments in 1914-18. His consistent position has been one of horror at all dictatorship, whatever its name, and whether from or of so-called "Left" or "Right." Let the victim be Anarchist, Communist, Socialist, or Fascist, he saw the internment policy wrong in 1914 and 1916, and he saw it equally wrong in 1940. Which is why he published It Might Have Happened to You, in December 1943, as a factual challenge of the 1940 internments.

This photograph was taken in the garden of 17 Richmond Gardens, Shepherds Bush. Here Aldred came to live after his release from Brixton Prison in 1910. It was a tenement dwelling. This address was the home of much political activity and the scene of several raids. Mylius was arrested on its doorstep. In 1921, an attempt was made to eject Aldred but the County Court Judge upheld Aldred's right of tenancy and defended his right to be an Anarchist and a war-resister. The Judge declared that Aldred was a "perfectly good citizen" who held radical and unusual views which he had a right to express freely in a free country. Aldred vacated this address in 1924.

Guy Aldred, stated to be editor of a Socialist paper called the Spur, has been remanded at West London charged with failing to surrender himself under the Military Service Act. He is here seen with his wife and their son Annesley Aldred. He says he was married according to Scottish law. The tribunal has to decide whether Aldred is married or not.—(Exclusive.)

NOTES AND COMMENTS
BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The rosy hopes of an end to the war in Europe by October, or at least by Christmas, have been dispelled. The Prime Minister now tells us that fighting may continue until the summer, so the carrot retains its accustomed distance before the Allied donkey's nose. This comparison is an apt one, save that it is unfair to the ass, an animal well able to judge whether an enterprise be not to his advantage and possessed of sufficient determination to make his objections felt by those who would drive him onwards. Surely only nations composed of human donkeys would, at this stage of the war in particular, support their governments in their determination to crush utterly or enslave the enemy, thereby rendering a third war almost certain and involving them in a further period of wholly unnecessary suffering?

The strict orders against fraternization with enemy civilians issued to British and American troops, tell their own ugly story. How dreadful it would be if our men returning from the Front on leave were to blow the gaff on the foul lies of war propaganda by revealing the fact that Germans, after all, are just ordinary people like ourselves, and sometimes very decent people! Those who had first-hand experience of Germany before the war and who tell soldiers with no experience of the country that they often found Germans kindly and normal, are sometimes assured that they were deceived by the cunning of a malignant race. This seems to point to a special brand of dope served out for the benefit of the troops, but I have an idea that, dope and orders notwithstanding, personal human contacts will open the soldiers' eyes to the truth, though it may be too late to do much good.

Considerable publicity has been given in some of the American papers, and even, for a short time, in our own, to the case of Tyler Kent, the clerk in the American Embassy who has received a long sentence of penal servitude for revealing the contents of certain telegrams exchanged, during Mr. Chamberlain's Premiership, between Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt. According to the American account, these telegrams dealt with the question of bringing America into the war, lease-lend provisions, etc. Kent, shocked by what he felt to be President Roosevelt's unconstitutional action in making such plans behind the back of Congress, and by Mr. Churchill's unconstitutional action in discussing them behind the back of his Chief, felt that it was in the public interest that they should be disclosed and communicated his discovery to Captain Ramsay. After Kent's imprisonment, according to an American paper, his mother arranged for an American citizen to visit him. The latter, after his return to the United States, spoke very critically about the whole business and soon afterwards died suddenly and mysteriously.

In this country it has been suggested that Kent intended to communicate his discovery to the Russian Government. To me this story smells of propaganda, and even if it does describe Kent's intention accurately, it seems most strange that Mr. Churchill should resent any of his private affairs being revealed to his trusty comrade, the "old war-horse" Stalin!.

In the House of Commons on October 12th our near-Communists, Mr. Driberg and Mr. Pritt, again gave a display of their propensity for Fascist political tyranny and persecution by demanding a list of the members of the Right Club with which Captain Ramsay was associated. Mr. Morrison, in refusing this request, showed, in his reply, both spirit and good feeling. Readers of The Word will not need to be assured that I am no ardent admirer of the Home Secretary. His lust for power and office have caused him to sink low, very low indeed, when one remembers the views he once expressed. It is therefore only fair to note that there are depths of petty tyranny to which he still refuses to descend, even though Mr. Driberg and Mr Pritt may be more than ready to plumb them.

The sudden death of the Archbishop of Canterbury gives rise to rather sad reflections—reflections which are evoked when the promise of a man's early days is not fulfilled in later life. There was a time, soon after the last war, in the days of C.O.P.E.C. (Conference on Christian politics, economics, and citizenship), when some of us hoped that William Temple would go far as a leader in Christian social reform. A fatal tendency to compromise, of which I gather from a conversation I once had with a mutual friend, Temple himself was not wholly unaware, robbed him of the true honour he might have had, though it may be that it gave him the see of Canterbury. At any rate, although his attitude towards war can only be deplored, in his latter years he showed more enlightenment than most Church leaders on the question of financial reform, and at times he incurred the censure of the Financiers' Press by his bold criticism of the existing order.

If Dr. Temple did not fulfil the promise of his early days, the same is even more true of the surviving Archbishop. When I first knew him many years ago in Portsmouth, I should have found it difficult to recognise in Canon Garbett of St. Mary's, Portsea, the rabid warmonger who is now Archbishop of York. High office in a State Church seems to be as bad for a man's soul as it is destructive to his intelligence.

The Financiers' little game continues to be played merrily. Closer study of the Government's Social Insurance plan reveals, as in the case of the Beveridge plan, a host of bureaucratic tyrannies and inquisitions behind the "benefits" displayed in the shop window.

An acquaintance, active in the field of monetary reform, recently told me that he was discovering that a high percentage of circulars sent out to local government bodies and recommending measures which would greatly reduce the burden of the rates, while improving the living conditions of the people, never reached their destination, and evidence was forthcoming that the Treasury and certain members of the Cabinet were active in opposing the policy advocated. He also told me that other monetary reformers reported the sabotage of about four-fifths of the literature they send out. (Socialists should note that this hanky-panky was considered necessary in the defence of Finance. No attack was being made on ordinary capitalism.)

A retiring banker recently wrote to a monetary reformer saying that he had long agreed with all his views and would like to meet him. He intended to write a book exposing the Finance racket but hitherto had been prevented from doing so as he had a family dependent on him. Soon afterwards the monetary reformer wrote to arrange details of the time and place for an interview and was surprised to receive a curiously-worded letter in reply in which the banker disclaimed all knowledge of the suggested meeting. On the letter were two words in printed handwriting, crossed out, the second of which was "advised." The monetary reformers' secretary then wrote to the banker to make sure that there was no mistake. An opened letter was received in reply on the back of which the banker had written "Please note that I have, at no time, written to—(the name of the monetary reformer)—and have no reason to trouble him with an interview. Kindly, therefore, consider this matter closed." Clearly the original letter had been opened by our Gestapo and the unfortunate banker had received such a threat as effectively to deter him from his contemplated exposure of the goings-on of our real masters! I have myself seen the actual correspondence.

Stalin's speech, if correctly reported, in which he expressed the desire to march to Berlin, and advocated the maintenance of peace in the post-war world by powerful Allied armed forces is hardly encouraging. Where there is no vision the people will continue to perish. We must work and pray that in all countries vision may appear to save us from the third war which is inevitable as long as British, American and Russian leaders understand human nature and the lessons of history so little and are so disinclined to take risks for a new and better way in international relationships.

A striking example of the mental and moral degeneration characteristic of the present time is provided by the attitude displayed by numbers of people when one points out to them that although we entered the war to preserve the integrity of Poland, it seems likely that the circumstances of victory will force us to acquiesce in the violation of that integrity by Russia. "What a pity, but it can't be helped!" is all they say. So corrupted are they by war emotion and propaganda that the loss of the moral objectives for which we are supposed to be fighting hardly disturbs them at all. The defeat of Germany has become the only thing that matters. Whether the results of unconditional surrender be good or bad is immaterial to them. They fight now like senseless animals which, without even the practical gain of food or mates in view, struggle with their opponents merely for the sake of beating them and bullying them after the victory has been gained.

It is interesting, though sad, to note how speedily "liberated" countries become the prey of intolerant political groups claiming to be patriots but often in reality Communists, who at once begin to persecute their political rivals, using methods which in this country are associated with "Fascism."

How often have I pointed out that political cruelty and tyranny are not vices peculiar to Axis countries but are latent in nearly every nation and make their appearance directly the necessary conditions of stress are provided? "Scratch a Russian and a Tartar appears" was an old saying. Scratch any nation until it is sore and raw and Fascism appears. What is the lesson that this should teach us? Plainly that it is folly to go on thinking of the Axis peoples as a pariah class deserving special treatment and special punishment. Fundamentally all nations share the same sins and the same weaknesses. That they have appeared more in some than in others has often been due, not to greater depravity, but to greater provocation. All now need a common repentance. None are competent to take the mote out of their brother's eye until they have removed the beam from their own. All require freedom and fair treatment if they are to follow a better way. All should bind themselves by a common pledge to do so.

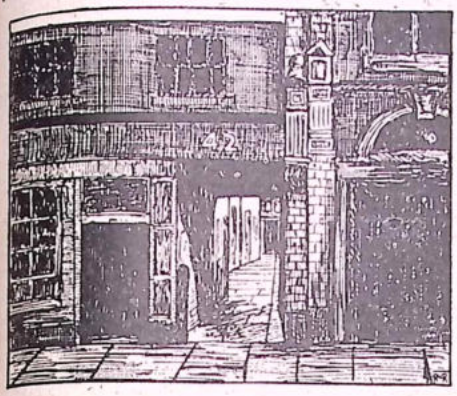
SOUTH PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY (1793-1944)

During this period, the Society's meeting places have been:—



PARLIAMENT COURT CHAPEL, BISHOPSGATE, February 14, 1793 to the establishment of SOUTH PLACE CHAPEL, FINSBURY, February 1, 1824—March 31, 1927.

LONDON INSTITUTION, FINSBURY CIRCUS, used until

CONWAY HALL was occupied on September 1, 1929.

Parliament Court Chapel was the oldest of all Universalist Churches in London. It was built in the 16th Century and restored in the 18th Century as a Church for the use of Elhanan Winchester, whose story has been told in this record.

South Place Universalist Church, afterwards South Place Ethical Society, was built by the Universalists of Parliament Court Chapel, and opened in 1824, with W. J. Fox as Pastor.

SOUTH PLACE

A STORY OF HERESY, PROGRESS AND CULTURE.

Fox lost the Presbyterian wing of his Society. In 1835, he delivered seven lectures on "Morality as Modified by the Various Classes into which Society is Divided." Here he passes from theology to sociology, approaches an economic interpretation of ethics and events. Between 1841 and 1842, he discarded gradually the old Aspland Hymn-book and replaced it with his own hymns and anthems. He was less scriptural, less book-bound, more secular, imaginative, and resolute. And so came the beginnings of the South Place Society.

In 1836, Fox had to economise his strength. The Monthly Repository passed into the editorship of Richard Henry Horne and later Leigh Hunt. The Sunday evening meetings were addressed by others. On February 27, 1840, the Rev. Philip Harwood was invited to become Fox's coadjutor.

Harwood was, at one time, Unitarian minister at Bridport. He rationalised Paul's conversion in a sermon he preached in St. Mark's Unitarian Church, Edinburgh. This caused his exclusion from the pulpit and the formation, in 1839, of a short-lived Clyde Street Society. In 1823, Fox had dedicated the Young Street Society, which built St. Mark's. Naturally, Fox was interested in Harwood's exclusion and invited him to South Place. Harwood opened his ministry with startling lectures on Strauss' Leben Jesu, not then translated. Fox defended Harwood's heresy in his morning discourses.

Harwood resigned from the Society on September 23, 1841, and became lecturer to the Philosophical Institution in Beaumont Square. He was removed for his heresy and entered journalism. Subsequently, Harwood became editor of the Saturday Review, and held that position till his death in 1877. The heresiarch of 1840 became an able editor.

Harwood's six revolutionary lectures on Christian mythology caused Miss Brabant to start translating Strauss' Life of Jesus. She resigned the task to Marian Evans (George Eliot) in 1843.

On Easter Sunday, 1842, was celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of Fox's settlement with the Society. Replying to an address from the members, Fox dealt on its reiterated affirmation of the one confession of faith which he made when he became minister of the Society: "I believe in the duty of free inquiry, and in the right of religious liberty."

He explained: "The Society has continued to act in the spirit of the language thus employed. . . . And what is the Christian religion, as professed by this congregation, but the religion which has for its great and vital principle the duty of free inquiry, and the right of religious liberty That is our Christianity. If Christianity be not that; if Christianity be at war with that; why the sooner we renounce it the better. But if this be Christianity, the longer and the more steadfastly we cling to it the better." He traced the history of the Society and recalled the fidelity of Winchester and Vidler. He concluded: "A right of inquiry which is bounded, is not a right worthy of a rational creature."

In 1847, Fox, who was now M.P. for Oldham, endeavoured to resign. Fox did such good work for humanity in various ways that John Bright once remarked to the Unitarian, Lyon, classing Fox as an outstanding Unitarian, "You Unitarians are very useful for this world's work." The congregation thought of unting Fox's ministerial and political work by selling South Place and establishing a National Hall in the West End of London. Fox's work culminated in his famous discourses on "Religious Ideas," delivered in 1849. These anticipated the famous Hibbert Lectures by about half a century.

In February 1849, the Rev. Newenham Travers gave three lectures at South Place on his reasons for leaving the Established Church. He became assistant minister and took half the Sundays. He retired at the close of 1850.

In a sermon on inspiration, Travers said:—"Look for inspiration in thine own heart, and thou wilt find it there at last. The circle of thy vision, so small whilst thou wast bondman to tradition and the preacher of a narrow faith, will enlarge itself ever, till it embrace in its range the interests of humanity; and thou wilt delight in no meaner labour than that which toils for the good of all, in faith of the great destinies of all, in recognition of the brotherhood of all, and of their equal filial relation to the God and Father of all."

In January 1851, the Rev. Henry Ierson became assistant minister, nominally, but actually minister. He resigned on April 24, 1857. Mr. Ierson claimed the right to act on the Government Committee of the Society, but the congregation decided that the minister had no right to be a member of the Government Committee.

In 1848 Mr. Fox lectured twenty-six times: in 1849, twenty-six times; in 1850, "three courses"; in 1851, eight lectures; in 1852, six lectures.

In January 1858, the Rev. Henry Barnett, of Bristol, became minister. In 1862, he endeavoured to introduce a hymn-book with chanting, and established a publication called "The South Place Pulpit." He resigned in June 1863, because he objected to the Society being intent "on a career of iconoclastic adventures and exploits."

This was an attack on Fox.

The Committee replied. There was some talk of closing the chapel. But able speakers came forward—William Binns, Joseph Barker, Coupland, John Page Hopps, William Maccall, Hurst Smith, Simpson, Whitehead, Washington Wilks, J. C. Street, and Francis Newman. Then came Moncure Conway to listen.

Conway came from the U.S.A. in April 1863, on an anti-slavery mission, it being supposed that a Virginian abolitionist might influence opinion against the Southern Confederacy. He was the guest of the Taylors, who were members of the Society. His family was in the U.S.A., and he intended to return. Circumstances induced him to stay. His family joined him in Britain in September 1863.

On the outbreak of the Civil War, Conway had resigned his pulpit in Cincinnati, in order to concentrate against slavery. With the war nearing its end, his longing for a pulpit revived. So he received a temporary call to South Place. During the autumn and winter of 1863, he several times occupied its pulpit. On January 31, 1864, he was invited to occupy the pulpit for six months. The request was repeated in June; and at the annual meeting in 1865, the request was made permanent. He was just thirty-one years of age. His salary was £150 a year, and it remained this for eight years. It had seemed a long pilgrimage from his Methodist itinerancy in Maryland to the South Place pulpit. En route, he had sat at the feet of Emerson and Theodore Parker.

Conway reached England in time to know Fox. Fox was still M.P., but retired soon afterwards. He died at his residence, 3 Sussex Place, Regent's Park, on June 3, 1864. Nine days later Conway delivered the memorial discourse and linked his name with that of the Society.

In 1869, women appeared in the South Place pulpit. Mrs. Bruce, wife of a Universalist minister in Yorkshire, was the pioneer. Afterwards came Ernestine Rose, a co-worker of Robert Owen; Elizabeth Cady Stanton, the veteran advocate of Woman's Rights in New York; Mary Livermore, the famous Universalist minister who did such splendid work among the negro freedmen in the U.S.A. during the Civil War; Julia Ward Howe; Helen Taylor; Annie Besant; Mrs Ormiston Chant, and Frederika Macdonald.

In 1875, Conway returned to the United States. He was offered Theodore Parker's pulpit, but returned to South Place on March 27, 1876, instead, at the request of the Society.

In July 1885, he retired, but returned in October 1892. He retired finally five years later. Conway's story can be told separately.

This story commenced in "The Word" for August, 1943. In the May, 1943, issue, we published a very complete chronological sketch of South Place and its ministers. At an early opportunity this record will be revised, chaptered, and published in pamphlet form. It belongs to the history of Humanist propaganda.

MANCHESTER P.P.U.

The Manchester Peace Pledge Union must have been agreeably surprised, highly satisfied, and very, very encouraged when the first Lunch-Hour meeting of a series which they have arranged was held in the Friends' Meeting House, in the heart of their City, on Friday, November 3rd. The place was overcrowded before the time of opening and there was no doubt that at long last an increasing number of the common folk are coming to the conclusion that they have been fairly fooled about the present War and the aims of the Allied Nations.

Our Comrade, Rhys Davies, M.P., was the speaker, and he made no secret of his detestation of the whole ugly business of war. His subject was, "The Treatment of Germany," and he was loudly applauded when he made the point that there was no possible hope of Peace even for the next ten years in Europe if the war-mongers have it all their own way once again.

It was fairly obvious that those in power had at last been convinced that it was against their own capitalist interests to impose the payment of reparations in kind on this occasion as in 1919. They were, therefore, prating about punishing the War criminals and urging the break-up of Germany, with the suggestion that ten million Germans now residing in East Prussia, the Sudeten, Silesia, the Corridor and Danzic are to be deported into the Reich and a sanitary cordon put right round them as if they were lepers. The foulest suggestion of all, supported by a section of the Labour Movement, was that the Allies should demand slave labour gangs of Germans to be utilised all over the devastated territories to rebuild them again.

Rhys Davies ventured the view that those who made such suggestions, especially Labour men and women, would be thoroughly ashamed of themselves when the War was over in Europe, for having ever uttered such criminal futilities.

Questions were put and answered. The suggestion was made repeatedly from the crowd that the time had arrived when all those who loved Peace should get together and arrange monster demonstrations in order to bring pressure to bear on the Government to wind up the whole ridiculous carnage now proceeding.

Thus Rhys Davies, in the country as in the House of Commons, fearlessly and tirelessly continued his magnificent work for Socialism and Peace. He is the outstanding champion of justice, common-sense, and the common people's struggle in the Labour movement to-day. We ask that the strongest possible support be given by all comrades to his work. He commands our full solidarity.

OUR LETTER-BOX

My Dear Guy,—The last issue of "The Word" was excellent. The speech on page 1, "But Was It Luck," is a real stunner, and gives a very clear idea of what power politics means these days. Persuaded many people to read it by lending copies. "The Call to Manhood" also good.

Reflected to-day it will be forty years at the beginning of next year, 1945, since we first met. Our dreams seem to be not so very much nearer, but still we must carry on, for nothing else in the world is worth thinking about.

With all good wishes.

Yours in the struggle.

GEORGE ROSE.

London, S.W.1, October 19.

Dear Sir,—Many thanks for copies of "The Word," accompanying numerous pamphlets issued by the Strickland Press.

I am old enough to remember reading how the daily press abused you, also E. D. Morel and others in days gone by. Such is the fate of pioneers. "Pioneers, O Pioneers," exclaimed Whitman.

Anyway, I notice that you have not lost your punch in dealing with hypocrisy, humbug and the like.

Good luck and best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

S. GORDON HOGG.

Tunbridge Wells, Kent.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Looking through these back copies of "The Word" is like re-reading the history book and learning afresh some of these things, a reminder of which is very necessary. Your conviction in Glasgow in 1921 is still fresh in my memory but I was glad to be reminded of the trials of these days. Then a youth of 19 years I was deeply interested in men and affairs and I have you largely to thank that I threw Roman Catholicism overboard, despite a rigid upbringing in that Faith.

In those back years, yours was a name which one often saw in print and your staunch stand against militarism in the last war invoked my then faithful admiration. Too often in those days I was called "Pro-German" by nineteen-year-old school friends. I am happy that, like yourself, my abhorrence to war has remained.

I note with pleasure the wide range of opinion in "The Word," not only in the written matter, but also in the announcements.

Your many references to Richard Carlile are tribute indeed to this great Fighter. Alas! he has been forgotten of late and much credit is due to you for the reminder of all that this great man was and did.

As for "His Grace" of Bedford, he is the most misunderstood man of our generation; a voice crying in the wilderness.

During my stay at Woburn, opinion varied about the Duke, but the significant fact that I gathered was that he was a man with a sympathetic understanding of the people's problems. Some (the Church of England adherents) called him an Atheist Criminal and Pro-Nazi; others said he was a crank, but all were agreed that he was a "just landlord" (whatever that is!).

Yours fraternally,

E. WILLIAMS.

Tufnell Park, London, N. 7.

Dear Friend,—I find much in "The Word" to interest me; there is also much that puzzles me, and I should be glad if you have time to enlighten me.

You say you are an Anti-Parliamentarian. Emma Goldman described you as an Anarchist; her judgment is likely to be correct. Yet a large proportion of your periodical is devoted to reports of speeches and articles, by or about various I.L.P. M.P.'s, and especially the Duke of Bedford, who is certainly a parliamentarian, for you publish (without comment) appeals by him that we should all write to our M.P.'s.

It is gratifying to read, in another connection, "No adulation of personalities, and to this end a constant watch upon the tendencies to hero-worship." (July, 1944, p. 137).

While I admire these people, and feel that they are doing great services for minority opinion by publicising facts, surely no anarchist should support them, however much he agrees with their aims, without stating, clearly and repeatedly, that he does not believe in their methods.

People whose views differ in this way can unite for defence, but when it comes to constructive action, they have little in common. What aim have you in collecting such heterogeneous views in one paper? Your own anti-parliamentarism is none too clearly emphasised.

And what is the United Socialist Movement?

I find your paper interesting, and want to take it for a while to get a clearer idea of its nature and purpose.

Yours sincerely,

ARTHUR FRENCH.

SEVENTY YEARS OF EUROPEAN DIPLOMATIC HISTORY

BY C. H. NORMAN

There has recently been published an interesting and important book for all students of international affairs, entitled "Studies in Diplomacy and Statecraft," by Professor G. P. Gooch (Longman's, 12/6 net). The width of the subject matter covered is best shown by naming the main chapters: "Franco-German Relations, 1871-1914;" "The Diplomatic Background of the First World War," "British Policy before the War of 1914 in the light of the Archives," "British Foreign Policy, 1919-1939," "Political Autobiography," which is a critical discussion of the confessions of makers of history, beginning with Babur, the founder of the Mogul Empire, and ending with Herr Hitler's "Mein Kampf;" "Politics and Morals," which is a discussion of how far Machiavelli was correct in asserting in "The Prince" that the policy of all States was without morality or "beyond good and evil," adapting Nietzsche's phrase used in another connection. The essay on "The French Revolution as a World Force," can be coupled with the final essay on the forerunner of the Absolute State, "Hobbes and the Absolute State," Hobbes sharing with Locke the reputation of being the most original thinker in England on politics and statecraft of that period. The remaining essays in the book consist of a review of the characters of Prince Bulow and Herr Kiderlen-Wachter, the man responsible largely for the active element in German foreign policy prior to 1914.

The book should be read in conjunction with another remarkable study of European politics in the period of Louis XIII, "Grey Eminence," by Aldous Huxley, for Mr. Huxley, quite rightly, is of opinion that the catastrophe which has overtaken the European world, extending gradually across the globe, can be traced back to the politics of men of power and authority such as Cardinal Richelieu, the Red Cardinal, and Father Joseph, his secretary, who is described by Mr. Huxley as "Grey Eminence," though his death occurred before the intended Cardinal's hat was conferred upon him.

Both these books are a credit to English erudition and scholarship. They are so good that it is a duty to draw attention in some detail to their argument, as the events they analyse have obtruded themselves into the lives and homes of most citizens of the world in some way. Mr. Huxley's book will only be used for object of reference in this article, the main purpose of which will be to discuss the problems and matters debated by Prof. Gooch, which cover directly the conduct of many leading men, whose policies have affected the lives of two or three generations of European citizens, in the sense of bringing disaster upon almost everyone concerned.

The first essay on "Franco-German Relations" opens with a singularly-phrased sentence: "The war of 1870, though contrived by Bismarck, was begun by Napoleon III, and defeated France had to pay his debts." Lower down Prof. Gooch remarks, "Outside France, the annexation of Alsace and a portion of Lorraine was generally regarded as the natural punishment of the Power which had declared war and had been beaten. Where is the nation which with bitter memories like those of the invasions of Louis XIV and Napoleon, would have returned empty-handed from a sanguinary struggle and would have left in the possession of its defeated enemy rich territories which had formed part of its own vanished Empire? If France had won, she doubtless would have annexed part of the Rhineland. Amputation is the common practice of conquerors. The peacemakers of 1919 had no title to cast stones at the peace-makers of 1871: both alike built for the day, not for the morrow."

This passage is a complete destruction of the historical and moral attitude of Lord Vansittart, who is so busy defaming Germans in the hope that he may preserve in that way his own somewhat shattered reputation as a diplomat, whose value to his country can best be judged by the plight in which that country, which paid him well for his service, is standing.

The criticism that can still be made on Prof. Gooch's summary is that the partitions of 1919 were infinitely more harmful to Europe than those of 1870, while the social and economic reasons for which the French ruling class exploited the ill-feeling between Germany and France between 1871 and 1914 are largely ignored by Prof. Gooch. The conduct of Great Britain during the Moroccan crises must be criticised from the point of view that the Foreign Office took the side of the disturbers of the peace and exasperated the high feeling instead of pacifying it.

At the conclusion of the essay Prof. Gooch has a very valuable summary of the real state of international feeling in Europe which had reached its culmination in about 1912, though, oddly enough, the Professor forgets his own summary in the rest of the book: "The Continent was racked by three separate but simultaneous antagonisms. The oldest was the quarrel between France and Germany over Alsace and Lorraine. Second in order of time was the competition of Russia and Austria for hegemony in the Far East. The most recent was the rivalry between England and Germany for the command of the seas. Moreover, the network of alliances ensured that a serious quarrel between any two of the Great Powers would develop into a general scrimmage."

He ends the chapter with a little rhetoric which is a playful way that Professor Gooch has of slipping away from the logical result of his own previous calm analysis.

The two essays dealing with British Foreign Policy up to the war of 1914 are a skilful attempt to justify and whitewash the record of Sir Edward Grey. Naturally, there are some extraordinary omissions, but some of the weaker excuses put forward by Lord Grey's apologists find no place in Prof. Gooch's defence.

It is well at this point to recall some of the catch phrases which were used in the war of 1914-1918, and compare them with the similar phrases of the war now proceeding. In 1914, the leading phrases were "the sanctity of treaties," as pointed by the Belgian Treaty; "The Crushing of Prussian militarism," which is now represented by "The overthrow of Nazi tyranny." and "The war to end all war," which has its counterpart to-day in the phrase that "aggression between nations shall cease and that the aggressor nations shall be rendered incapable of aggression for all time."

Consider for one moment the honesty of the argument about Belgian neutrality as put in the words of the memorandum of Sir Charles Hardinge, Permanent Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office, which is quoted by Prof. Gooch: "Supposing that France violated the neutrality of Belgium in a war against Germany it is, under present circumstances, doubtful whether England or Russia would move a finger to maintain Belgian neutrality, while if the neutrality of Belgium were violated by Germany it is probable that the converse would be the case." The position is there accurately stated: It was a one-way guarantee only and had nothing to do with the welfare of Belgium as a State.

Prof. Gooch, naturally, has something to say about the Balance of Power doctrine, which he sums up in this language: "The only check on a powerful and aggressive State is the existence of an equally formidable rival or league of defence. The equilibrium established on such a grouping of forces is technically known as the Balance of Power, and it has become almost a historical truism to identify England's policy with the maintenance of this balance by thowing her weight now in this scale and now in that, but ever on the side balance by throwing her weight now in this single State or group at a given time. If this view of British policy is correct, our opposition to any country aspiring to such a dictatorship assumes almost the form of a law of nature."

Stripped of verbiage and put in simple terms, this argument (which apparently is favoured and sponsored by Prof. Gooch) is a declaration that Britain is to be the dictator of policy in Europe on international matters and that no rival will be tolerated. This may be sound and prudential, but wherein lies the justice of the moral criticism of other States which should attempt to challenge the dictatorship of Britain, which has caused certainly four of the most disastrous wars which have afflicted the Continent of Europe, namely, the Napoleonic war, which established reaction in France for a century; the Crimean war, which to-day is recognised as a criminal adventure by all historians; the war of 1914-1918, and the war which began in 1339 and will end goodness knows when or how.

It was a calamity for England that the leading advisers at the Foreign Office were actuated by an anti-German bias, namely Sir Eyre Crowe, Sir William Tyrrell and Sir Robert Vansittart. On the other side there was the permanent official Holstein, who was certainly not enamoured of British policy or methods on the Continent of Europe.

Prof. Gooch, in his record of his conversation with Lord Grey on February 14, 1929, said, "I am impressed by Eyre Crowe's intense hostility to Germany", to which Grey merely replied, "Crowe was anti-German. But I don't think the minutes of officials ought to be published, or they will be afraid to write them".

It never occurred to Lord Grey that perhaps he and Crowe owed some duty to the persons who were employing them, the British taxpayers who had to pay so terribly in blood and treasure for their blunders. Moreover, the anti-German hostility of Crowe was domestic. The dangers of permanent officials at the Foreign Office having foreign-born wives was never more markedly shown than in his case.

On the general principle, while officials at the Foreign Office should have a scrupulous care for the true interests of the country which is employing and paying them, and should abstain from undertaking financial interest in foreign countries (which, unfortunately, was not the case), they are doing a grave disservice to this country to permit their minds to be influenced by bias against any foreign state or form of government, for that prevents them in engaging in any impartial survey of events.

Prof. Gooch's defence of the policy of England is partly based on the reiterated statement that "we were a satisfied power and well content with that we had in 1914."

There is no foundation for this statement. All through this period there were all kinds of mysterious intrigues about the Belgian Congo and the Portuguese African Colonies. In 1919, the British Empire received enormous additions at the expense of Germany: while, as late as March, 1938, Britain was occupying territories in the Pacific, as for instance Canton Island. Between 1919 and 1939, Britain never surrendered a square yard of territory to anyone, except some hundreds of square miles of African desert (which were ceded to Italy in a belated attempt to placate her for her treatment by France and Britain in 1919) and the return of Wei-hai-Wei to China.

(To be concluded.)

THE CHILD AND THE STATE

BY ARTHUR FRENCH

When a child is born its parents have to pay the State for the (compulsory) registration of its birth. You might think that the payment of this fee, making them legally the parents of the child, would leave them free to devote the rest of their available time and income to the child's material needs. But the State interferes straight away and says the child must be vaccinated. This, it does free; but vaccination is not esteemed too highly nowadays, even in orthodox medical circles. If the parents wish the child to be left alone, they must swear on oath before a J.P. or a Commissioner for Oaths. If they can find a J.P. who will do it (not all of them will, though they have no real right to refuse), it will cost nothing. Otherwise, it will cost 2/- or so. All this trouble, and possibly money, is spent to prevent the State vaccinating the child (of course, vaccination creates employment, and is thus a vested interest).

Let us not show too much bias against the authorities. They do provide cheap milk, orange juice, etc., for all babies; they provide Child Welfare Clinics. And, when the child is five, they offer a free schooling.

But why all this interest in the child? Is it completely disinterested? Is it merely to make happy, healthy, helpful members of the community? Sometimes one would think so, but listen to Professor G. M. Trevelyan (English Social History; Longmans)—"If we win this war, it will be won in the primary and secondary schools." Ah! so perhaps it would pay the anti-militarist to go into this a little further!

Firstly, notice that "education," i.e., attendance at an approved school (or private tuition, if one can afford it), is compulsory. If a man has an income well above the average, and not too many children, he can choose between the State school, the conventional private (sometimes "public") school, or a "progressive" school. Most people have no choice. Their children go to to the State school; they have to send them there, under penalty of fine or gaol, however much they may object to anything that is taught there, or any methods used.

Actually, the State secondary school is often a more liberal (and even libertarian) place than the private school, which has a far more direct financial interest in turning out men who will "fit in" to existing society, make good in business or the professions, and send their own sons to the school. The staff of the State school often represents a wide range of views and may even have a "left" political bias. It is in the elementary school that the system is found at its worst; its staff go straight there from (a State) school without any university course—which has some broadening effect, however remote from reality its teaching may be; the classes are large, resulting inevitably in strict discipline and inadequate individual attention; many such schools are intimately connected with some religious denomination. The result may not be an educated man or woman, but the State gets what it wants: a subservient worker or soldier.

"The men and women who went through the State schools showed no lack of desire or willingness to defend their land in the first world war," said Lord Latham in the House of Lords, "They have not shown any less willingness in this war." They will fall for the same stories next time, too, if the State still controls their minds from the age of five.

A century ago it was widely believed that to teach workers to read and write would turn them all into revolutionaries; but, with the growth of bureaucracy, a way was soon found to bring up literate workers without encouraging anything more terrifying than Trade-Unionism, and in 1870 the State entered the educational field. It is such a nuisance to the bureaucrat if his victims cannot read forms and fill them up. Illiteracy in the Army is objected to merely because of its nuisance value. Recruits cannot read notices on the Notice-board, and their "mark" has to be witnessed each time a signature is required. A sidelight on the purpose of education is given by the standard of literacy in the Army. Illiterates, after a six-weeks' course, can read a newspaper—the medium of government propaganda. Fifty years ago, the standard would have been the Bible, but the idea is the same!

Now, we are told, mere literacy is not enough. "We" (people who happen to live in Britain) must become a Nation of Technicians, if the country is to remain a First-Class Power (i.e., a State which can impose its policy on others by economic or military force), so education is prolonged to 16, and continuation classes are planned. All this for a definite economic reason, unrelated to the development of personality, of sensibility—in fact, it may definitely prevent full development. The primary aim is the interest of the State, not the people; the Bureaucracy, not the workers!

I have quoted two authoritative statements that the State schools produce supporters of war (defence of one's land is an obvious euphemism when it refers to fighting in France and Burma—what was it?—Poland's territorial integrity? Let us see how orthodox teaching gets these results.

Looked at very superficially, education might appear to be little more than fact—collecting and memory training, efficiency in certain logical operations, and a little attention to physical development. But it is easy to see, especially after the publicity given to German and Italian methods, that the manner of teaching some subjects—History and Geography most obviously—is influenced by political ends. But many conscientious opponents of Capitalism do not appear to see further than this.

The National Council of Labour Colleges for instance, while realising that "one of the main purposes of orthodox education is to train people to accept the present social order," believes that "the Capitalist State can be trusted to teach Arithmetic" and other technical subjects (The War of Ideas, by J. P. M. Millar, N.C.L.C.)

This is a demonstrably false view. It is convenient that the N.C.L.C. should raise the question of mathematical teaching, as I happen to have specialised in Mathematics at State expense, and know a little about orthodox teaching.

Let us consider the teacher of a School Cert. form. (This will be a stage reached by an increasing number of pupils when the leaving age is raised). He is teaching pupils (1) leaving at the end of the year, (2) going on to specialise in literary subjects, (3) going on to scientific subjects, (4) taking mathematics as a main subject, or (5) going to a technical or commercial course. He must decide what stress must be laid on aesthetic pleasure, everyday use, mental discipline, and the various needs of the different specialists. Is it not obvious that the way each aspect is approached, and the stress laid on each, has a profound social importance? In particular, the ordinary man't attitude to statistics, finance, taxes, is a political consideration of the first order, and is largely dependant on the teaching of maths.

Another valuable observation on curriculum is made by C. S. Lewis in his essay on education, The Abolition of Man (O.U.P.). He points out that, in the present form of society, scientific knowledge does not mean power of man over Nature, but "power exercised by some men over other men with Nature as its instrument."

The university syllabus in maths. and science is largely abstract, and unrelated to social problems, or even to possibilities of getting a job after graduation. Many students remain as schoolmasters or dons, in this educational system which has largely unfitted them for anything else. Similarly, univerity courses in English and other "non-technical" subjects do not as a rule produce innovators or aesthetes, but the Ideal Bureaucrat. The educational system is overwhelmingly successful from the State's point of view; it destroys the personality of all but a few of its victims. The exceptions become rebels, not only against the educational system but against society as a whole.

The relation between discipline, both in school and in youth organisations, and subservience in later life, is probably more obvious. Schools have sprung up which base their organisation on quite different relations between staff and pupils. Their aim is the maximum possible freedom. This view, however, often leads to paradox because it is usually reached by a negative road—the realisation of the evil characteristics of conventional methods, with the resulting wish to experiment with opposite ways. The paradox is reached because different spheres of activity are inter-related, and a change in one may not be sufficint to change the others, but, may easily cause conflict instead, both personally and socially. The child leaves schol and finds that the business and administrative world despises his high principles, and he goes to the wall. This is often produced as an indictment of progressive schools (see Progressive Schools, L. B. Pekin). The root of the seeming difficulty is that libertarian education is revolutionary (though not always consciously so). The product of such a school must be either a revolutionary or a nonentity. He cannot hope to be a "success" in existing society unless he is prepared to forgo his principles of freedom and equity.

For the anti-militarist, the main conclusions from this study are: that the State attempts systematically to adapt the child to its own ends; that it is, on the whole, successful; and that to oppose it is to be consciously or unconsciously, revolutionary. I believe that the State must be opposed in this field; and that to suggest sheltering the child from the issue till it is of an age to "think for itself" is fatal—the State has a finger in the pie from the beginning of the child's schooling, and surrounds him with books, papers, and radio, taking existing institutions for granted. To oppose it in the political field alone is futile. If fighting militarism means fighting the State and the economic system, why give your enemy ten years' start? Above all, if you hope that a child will become an anti-militarist, he must be prepared to meet an unprincipled, hostile society, and face it as a visionary and a revolutionary without hope of fame or fortune. Otherwise, more likely than not, he will leave school to take life for granted, and, when the Government declares the next war for him, he may even welcome it as an escape from the dullness and uncertainty of "Peace." The State will have had its way.

MILITARISM UNMASKS

WORKERS IN STALIN'S RUSSIA

WORKERS IN STALIN'S RUSSIA, by M. L. Berneri. 1s 0d. Post free, 1s 3d. It can be obtained from the "Word" Office, as well as from the office of its publishers, FREEDOM PRESS, 27 BELSIZE ROAD, LONDON, N.W. 6.

"Workers in Stalin's Russia" is the challenging title of a valuable factual work recently issued by the Freedom Press, London. It is written and compiled by M. L. Berneri. The work merits a wide circulation and should be considered and discussed wherever Socialists meet their fellow-workers. No apology is needed for the present exhaustive summary of this useful and simply written brochure.

The introductory chaper explains how difficult it has been to learn the truth about the conditions of life that have prevailed in Russia since the Bolshevik Revolution, and that exist to-day.

At every phase of the development of the revolution, as it advanced further and further into counter-revolution, the subsidised "Communist" press denied facts, and lied blatantly, in order to eulogise the "first Socialist State in the world." But the Capitalist press was prepared equally to distort facts in order to denounce that same alleged "Socialist State." After Hitler invaded Russia, the war-interests of Communists and Capitalist Conservatives, so-called Labour leaders and avowed reactionaries, came to coincide:—

All the parties supporting the present Imperialist war realised that Russia could be an important factor in crushing Germany and, with a few exceptions, they set about boosting the regime and its leaders.

Journalists who, till yesterday, had only referred to Stalin as the Red Butcher, Tory politicians who had thundered against the rape of Finland, trade-union officials who had denounced State dictatorship, military experts who revealed that Russian soldiers went barefooted, bishops who had lamented the immorality of Russian life and the murdering of priests, have now all joined hands to praise Russia as the greatest, mightiest, holiest of our Allies. Speeches are made, articles are written, pamphlets and books are published by the million to "sell" Russia to the British and American public. Such an advertising campaign does not take place to magnify the greatness of our American ally for example, but in the case of Russia our rulers and politicians have realised that it possesses still a great attraction amongst the masses as the "workers' country." By praising it they hope to get a more enthusiastic support for the war effort and increased production at cheap cost.

The author comments on the interesting fact that the boosting of Russia "remains purposely vague," and that while the happiness and grand conditions of living and education of the Russian workers are stressed in general terms, nothing is said specifically about the actual living conditions of the Russian people. The false and interested nature of this propaganda is driven home by unanswerable factual revelations:—

The boosting of Russia remains purposely vague. We are told of the happiness of the Russian workers, of their high standard of living, of the superiority of their system of education but few details and fewer facts are attached to these assertions. Press and politicians have achieved the incomparable feat of talking almost incessantly about Russia while saying nothing about the regime or the conditions of life of the inhabitants.

When the Russian-German pact was concluded the "Boersenblatt," the daily news bulletin of the German book trade, published a list of anti-bolshevist publications withdrawn from sale on the orders of the Nazi authorities. Books on "Forced Labour in the Soviet Union," "How the Russian Worker Lives," "Revelations about Moscow," etc., could no longer be sold or bought.

The "democracies" were no less tactful towards the Soviet Union when it joined the Allies. The "Bookseller" reported that most books critical to the Russian regime had been called back from circulation. The "Nation" 14/2/42 announced that: "Harper Brothers, which recently withdrew a biography of Stalin, has decided not to publish G. E. R. Gedye's book on his experiences as "New York Times" correspondent; and Doubleday, Doran will not issue the reminiscences of Alexander Barmine, former Soviet representative to Greece, who fled to this country after the Moscow trials. Both Barmine's and Gedye's books were completed, but the publishers felt that the times are unpropitious for books critical of Russia."

Within the Soviet Union, terrorist organisation prevents the truth leaking out, and the truth-tellers' family or friends are threatened with reprisals:—

If information does see the light its authors are taught such lessons as to discourage most would-be denouncers of Stalin's regime. Krivitsky, author of "I was Stalin's Agent," committed suicide; Carlo Tresca who denounced Communist machinations was murdered. A campaign was instituted against Jan Valtin, author of "Out of the Night," a book which created a tremendous sensation, asking that he should be expelled from the U.S.A. . . . In Mexico . . . Recently the Communists asked that Miguel Yoldi, ex-organiser of the Durruti column, Victor Serge who published several books attacking Stalin's regime, Julian Gorkin, an ex-Spanish communist, Marceau Pivert, a well-known French socialist, should be prosecuted by the Government as being fascist agents. These are but a few of the methods used by Communist Parties all over the world to silence any independent opinion on Russia and its regime.

Censorship on foreign journalists makes it impossible for the outside world to know anything beyond what the Government thinks fit to release. The policy of the Bolsheviks was responsible for the famine of 1932-33. States our author:

Three to seven million people starved to death in Russia during the 1932-33 famine without a word being published in the world press about it. And America had ten correspondents there!

Eugene Lyons, in "Assignment in Utopia," describes how the facts of the famine were concealed by the foreign journalists in Moscow:—

"'There is no actual starvation or deaths from starvation, but there is widespread mortality from diseases due to malnutrition.'

"This amazing sophistry, culled from a 'New York Times' Moscow dispatch on March 30, 1933, has become among foreign reporters the classic example of journalistic understatement. It characterises sufficiently the whole shabby episode of our failure to report honestly the gruesome famine of 1932-33 . . .

"The episode, indeed, reflects little glory on world journalism as a whole. Not a single American newspaper or press agency protested publicly against the astonishing and almost unprecedented confinement of its correspondents in the Soviet capital or troubled to probe for the causes of this extraordinary measure. . . .

"These philological sophistries, to which we were all driven, served Moscow's purpose of smearing the facts out of recognition and beclouding a situation which, had we reported it simply and clearly, might have worked up enough public opinion abroad to force remedial measures. And every correspondent, each in his own measure, was guilty of collaborating in this monstrous hoax on the world."

Concludes the author on this phase of the subject:—

The destruction of a mirage is an unpopular task. The man in a desert who is trying to convince his exhausted companion that the coveted oasis he sees in the distance is only a dream is likely to be answered with curses. The working-class is in an arid desert to-day. Betrayed, abandoned, weak, helpless, it looks towards Russia as a promised land, . . .

Transferred Russian patriotism is just as stupefying as patriotism for Britain, America or Germany. It is illogical, degrading; it has no end outside itself. . . .

It is important to destroy the myth of a happy and prosperous Russia if workers in this country are going to refuse to fight for lies and are not going to repeat the mistakes made by the Russian proletariat after the revolution.

In her next chapter, the author discusses the "Soviet" system. She rightly points out that she uses the expressions "Soviet Russia" and "Soviet Government" merely to conform to custom. Actually, she means "Bolshevik Russia" and "Bolshevik Government." Soviet organisations, administration, and ideals do not exist in Russia. The "dictatorship of the proletariat," a meaningless phrase as even the Webbs admitted, means, in reality, the dictatorship of the Communist Party.

The Bolsheviks interpreted the slogan: "All Power to the Soviets" as signifying: "All Power to the Party which controls the Soviets" and they went all out to conquer that power. . . .

During the revolution two organs of power were in existence: the factory and peasant Soviets on one side and the Communist Party on the other. The first represented the will of the masses of peasants and soldiers, the second a minority of professional militants and Party Members, anxious to get the masses under their control.

The struggle between those two organs ended in the victory of the Communist Party.

This is sound factual criticism. The author is not so happy in explaining how this came about. She stated that "the conquest of the Soviets by the Communist Party" was no accident. This phrase does not explain why or how the conquest came about. It is, indeed, a very weak comment for what is needed to be known is "how" the Communist Party became an organ of power, at first equal with the Soviets, and later above the Soviets. Before discussing this "how" that the author misses, we will note her comment on the fact of the struggle between the Soviets and the Communist Party.

The author details the industrial practical franchise of Sovietism and proceeds to show how Sovietism and "Communism" exclude one another.

The 1936 Constitution reduced the Soviets to mere administrative local organs of the centralised State Power or "Communist" dictatorship. The Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. has nothing in common with the early Soviet concept or organisation. Article 141 of the Constitution makes free political representation impossible apart from its complete annihilation of the right of industrial representation. It is an organised counter-revolution.

Empty declarations of Freedom of Speech, Press, Assembly, and Demonstration, are part of this Constitution. But none of these enactments are implemented. Legally, the Communist Party plays a minor role, but Stalin's declarations on the importance of the Party flagrantly contradict the Constitution.

In his book on "Leninism," Stalin boasts that "no important political or organisational problem is ever decided by our Soviets and other mass organisations without directives from our Party." He concludes "that the dictatorship of the proletariat is substantially the dictatorship of the Party."

The Webbs, in "Soviet Communism," quote Stalin's declaration to the German author, Emil Ludwig, in which the Russian dictator claims that the Central Committee of the Communist Party, consisting of 70 members, guides and controls all Soviet organisation: Co-ops.; distribution; Soviet farms; collective farms; individual peasant agriculture; military forces; nationalities; national policy.

The Central Committee of the Communist Party, although it has no power under the Constitution to do so, has issued decrees regarding marriage, divorce, and abortion.

The Webbs tried to explain Stalin's "Soviet Communism" by saying that it was necessary to produce a leader for the Russian people to revere after Lenin's death. This does not explain Stalin's ruthless struggle for power against his old comrades and possible rivals, the mock trials, murders by execution or less legalised assassination, until none of the junta that conspired to make Stalin existed. Every leader of the Russian Revolution has died a violent death except Stalin. Let the Socialist read the first Congresses of the Communist International and judge for himself.

Even the Webbs complain about the consistent boosting of Stalin, the fulsome references to him as "Comrade Stalin," the great leader of the people, etc. Also, they refer to the Communist Party as frankly accepting "the designation 'keeper of the conscience of the proletariat.'"

All this is powerful indictment. The author is to be congratulated upon stating the case so clearly. But why does she fail to explain how it came about? What caused the Left Social Revolutionaries, the Anarchists, and the other factions to fail, and to fall victims to the conspiracy of the Bolsheviks, which finally destroyed even the Bolshevik leaders, and left Stalin alone in power, supported by a post-war junta and conspiracy? Why did the Anarchists, for example, fail?

These questions are not posed and are not answered. Why? They are of vital importance to the common people. They should be discussed and answered. We suggest that our author is timid. She refuses to face this issue because the discussion would condemn the Bolsheviks but it would condemn equally the Anarchists. Her failure mars a valuable work. On the vital issue of how to create and preserve the revolutionary struggle, she remains silent.

This gap, and the reason for her silence, we will try to explain.

At the time that the first World War was declared, August, 1914, Russia was a vast agricultural country. The farm lands were inefficiently developed and the rural population lived in great poverty. Capitalist industry had developed, with the aid of foreign capital, but there was little home market, and so little intercourse between the town worker and the country worker. Out of this fact arose the slogan, "the dictatorship of the proletariat." There was a vast movement of opposition to Czarism, supported by peasants, capitalists, and proletarians. But there was little common interest between the 95 per cent. country workers and the 5 per cent. town proletariat. There existed a Socialist movement divided into bitterly antagonistic factions.

The Russian Social Democratic movement was divided, as is well-known, into two factions since 1903; the Mensheviks and the Bolsheviks. Inevitably, they became two distinct and opposing parties. The Mensheviks stood for purely constitutional statism. The Bolsheviks believed in illegal organisation. In 1905, the Bolsheviks urged conquest of power by revolution and saw Russia the revolutionary hope of Western Europe. Like the Mensheviks, despite their revolutionary slogans, the Bolsheviks believed in a programme of reforms and in being elected to the Duma. The pre-war demands of the Bolsheviks were: a democratic republic; expropriation of the landowners; and the eight-hour day. A trifle confusing because items 2 and 3 do not relate. The eight-hour day is a sensible demand only if expropriation is impossible of attainment. In one's own interest one might be willing to work a much longer day.

The Bolshevik power did not come from this programme. When the Czar's Government declared war, the Bolsheviks opposed war firmly and voted against war credits. They condemned strongly all so-called Socialists who supported the war, whether in Russia, Britain, France, Italy, Germany, or Austria. To this very clear anti-war stand the Bolsheviks owe their revolutionary and post-revolutionary status. Why will not the Anarchists face this fact? Certainly it was not an accident that the Bolsheviks became a power in revolutionary Russia.

We know what happened. Russia reached the stage where it became impossible for her to continue in the war. Strikes for peace as well as for wages occurred in the large towns. Crowds attacked the houses of the Czarist ministers. On March 11, 1917 the Czar ordered the dissolution of the Duma. His order was repudiated and the Duma continued to sit. Regiments revolted. Street-fighting occurred.

On March 15, the Czar abdicated.

A Provisional Government was formed by the Duma. It was Monarchist and pro-war. Kerensky was Minister of Justice. Councils of workers, peasants and soldiers — Soviets — arose. These Councils were openly opposed to the Bolsheviks and supported the Capitalist pro-war Provisional Government. Kerensky was Vice-President of the Soviet and the connecting link with the Duma.

In May, 1917, a second Provisional Government was formed, and two months later Kerensky became head of the Third Provisional Government. This Government was supported by the Soviets. The Bolshevik minority staged an anti-war demonstration, bearing the slogan: "Down with the Capitalistic Government! Down with war! All Power to the Soviets!" The Soviets opposed the demonstration and it was cancelled. The Mensheviks organised a Joint Conference of the Peasants' Soviet and the Workmen's and Socialist Soviet, and passed a resolution establishing the supreme authority of the Soviet, and expelling from, or denying membership to those who repudiated or conspired against the authority of the Soviet. The Soviet recalled troops from the front to suppress a Bolshevik armed rising against "The Government and The Soviet." Kerensky appealed to the Soviet to suppress Kornilov.

They were consistent in their anti-war attitude but not in their slogans of power.

In April, 1917, they demanded: "All Power to the Soviets."

This meant, then, power to the Mensheviks and the Left Social Revolutionaries, both pro-war factions.

In July they abandoned this slogan.

In September they revived it on condition of absolute freedom of agitation and the calling of a constituent assembly.

This offer was not accepted. But on September 9, a Bolshevik was elected President of the Kronstadt Soviet. On October 1, the Moscow Soviet elected a Bolshevik majority. A week later, Trotsky, regarded as a Bolshevik and acting as such in the closest alliance, was elected President of the Petrograd Soviet. A week later, this Soviet demanded the transfer of all power to the Soviets and immediate peace. On Novmber 7, this Soviet demanded the overthrow of the Government. Two days later came the Moscow rising. The Bolsheviks now consolidated their position with majorities in the Soviets. During the revolutionary struggle the Soviets superseded the Duma as the political machinery and the Bolsheviks took control of this machinery because they had proven to be the consistent anti-war party. Certainly they had used many revolutionary slogans, but their general policy was one of opportunism, now reformist, now revolutionary. Trotsky in his interesting and invaluable "Lessons of October, 1917," described the triumph of the Bolsheviks as an "almost constitutional armed insurrection." Actually they were voted into power by an overwhelming majority of non-Socialist workers and peasants on their programme of "Peace, Bread, and Land." They kept their pledge to end the war. Their attitude on the other issues is open to question and discussion.

Our author should have faced this record of the evolution of the Bolsheviks to power before indicting their conspiracy of dictatorship. Kropotkin's terrible war hysteria, mentioned in our last issue, robbed the Anarchists of their power to combat this conspiracy. Much harm was done to the entire revolutionary movement by this outrageous war attitude of Kropotkin at a time of supreme revolutionary crisis when he ought to have stood for peace. The Bolsheviks, by their uncompromising stand for Zimmerwald Pacifism, became the one party in Russia. Kropotkin by his retrograde Chauvinism made the Anarchists the group of reaction. Stern repudiation would have saved the situation. It was not forthcoming. And so the Bolsheviks became the one party of the revolution. With disastrous counter-revolutionary consequences they reduced what should have been a glorious sunrise to a hellish sunset. And to-day Stalin is the Chauvinist. The Communists mentioning Lenin's words less and less, but rejoicing in the shade of his authority, stand in 1944 where Kropotkin stood in 1917. Such is the tragedy of the struggle.

In failing to deal with the Kropotkin reaction, our author neglects her duty. But she writes with authority, power, and research on the events of Russian development from the time when the Bolsheviks seized power to the present time. It is sound deduction to follow her record of Trade Unions and The State; the Russian Factory; the Land; the Workers' Status; the Stakhanovite movement; Conscripted and Forced Labour; Women in the U.S.S.R.; Moulding Youth; "Justice" in U.S.S.R.; The Red Army, and "The Only Socialist Country in the World."

These excellent chapters we now summarise.

ANGLICAN PACIFIST FELLOWSHIP

Headquarters: 1 Adelaide Street, Charing Cross, London, W.C.2.

An organisation consisting of Communicant members of the Church of England, or of a Church in full Communion with it, who believe that membership of the Christian Church involves the repudiation of modern war. They pledge themselves to take no part in war, and to work for the construction of Christian peace in the world.

Pacifists of the Anglican Church first came together as a result of a letter to The Church Times, written by the Rev. R. Gofton-Salmond, asking pacifist priests to get in touch with him. A small group was thus formed and a meeting was held at St. Clement's Church, City Road, London. Other meetings followed at which Dick Sheppard was present.

On November 26th, 1936, a deputation which included Dick Sheppard, Canon Stuart Morris, the Rev. Paul Gliddon, Canon Denis Fletcher and the Rev. R. H. Le Messurier went to the Archbishops and put the pacifist case before them.

The first public meeting, at which over 1000 people were present, was held in the Central Hall, Westminster, on April 5th, 1937, with Dick Sheppard in the chair. The speakere were Father Andrew, Archdeacon Hartill, Canon Stuart Morris and the Rev. Paul Gliddon. A resolution was passed declaring that Jesus Christ would refuse to participate in modern war, and that his disciples ought to oppose war as being essentially evil.

On June 11th, 1940, the Archbishops said to a later deputation:

"We have never ceased to recognise the sincerity of pacifists, nor have we retracted our declarations as to their right to hold and expound their views within the Church of England.

On June 11th, 1937, a meeting was held at Kings Weigh House, with Canon Stuart Morris in the chair, at which The Anglican Pacifist Fellowship came into being.

The Duke of Bedford (then Marquis of Tavistock) was the first Chairman of the A.P.F. until the A.G.M. of 1939, when he resigned and Archdeacon Hartill was elected in his place.

The Rev. R. H. Le Messurier was appointed as the first Hon. Secretary. He resigned through illness. The Rev. C. Paul Gliddon took his place. He resigned on accepting a London hospital Chaplaincy.

All Anglican Pacifists should join the Fellowship and so maintain the constitutional right of a communicant of the Church of England to be a Pacifist. This is a most important right to assert.

LABOUR PACIFIST FELLOWSHIP

(AN ASSOCIATION OF PACIFIST MEMBERS OF THE LABOUR PARTY).

Headquarters:
127 Fellows Road, London, N.W.3.

Chairman: E. C. REDHEAD. Hon. Secretary: W. R. PAGE.

Dear Comrade Aldred,

GREECE.

This Fellowship deplores the situation that has arisen in Greece resulting in the use of British arms against a section of the Greek people. It condemns the Prime Minister's provocative statement which will exacerbate feeling rather than lead to a settlement. It urges the Government to send a Minister of high standing immediately to secure a settlement.

The Fellowship also deplores the use of Allied power to support reactionary regimes in this and other parts of Europe.

It calls attention to the tragic consequences of a resort to arms in the settlement of disputes and urges the workers everywhere to turn away from violence which threatens to engulf civilisation and to substitute determined resistance of a non-violent character, e.g., the boycott and strike, the efficacy of which has been proved in the workers' struggle.

Yours fraternally,

W. R. PAGE.

London, December 11, 1944.

A Member's meeting was held on December 10th, preceding the Annual Conference of the Labour Party, in the National Peace Council Offices, 144 Southampton Row, W.C.1.

The Labour Pacifist Fellowship decided to affiliate to the National Council for Civil Liberties, and the World Airways Council, being represented by R. S. W. Pollard. It also appointed a representative to the Watching Committee on Civil Liberty.

Ted Redhead was elected as chairman in place of Reginald Sorensen, M.P., who has served the Fellowship untiringly for five years.

The L.P.F. is to issue an open letter to pacifists who have left the Labour Party and one to C.O.'s stressing the need for Socialist Pacifist political activity on their part.

The L.P.F. supports the National Peace Council's Campaign for a Constructive Peace and is publicising it in the Labour Movement.

The Allied Policy in Greece was condemned and the Policy Committee was instructed to prepare a statement for publication.

The next National Committee meeting will be held at the N.P.C. Offices on February 18th. A full member's meeting will follow, to consider the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals; the opening Speaker to be Robert Pollard.

SEVENTY YEARS OF EUROPEAN DIPLOMATIC HISTORY

BY C. H. NORMAN

Prof. Gooch was the editor with Prof. Temperley of the British Documents on the Origins of the War: but his account of what has been included in those documents is apt to mislead. Dr. Hermann Lutz, the editor of the German documents, told the writer that he had not seen any of the secret reports to the Foreign Office from highly-placed agents abroad: nor are any such documents printed in the British Documents. Henry Seton Merriman, in his interesting novel on the Polish Question "The Vultures", described the types of agent who report directly to the Permanent Head of the Foreign Offices of the respective states.

In the British Documents, the only despatch dealing with the assassination of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand and his wife on Sunday, June 28, 1914, is a two-line message from Consul Jones.

One of the great gaps which Prof. Gooch does not seem to appreciate the importance of in the literature of the last war is an account of the activities of certain people in the capitals of Europe on that fatal Sunday. The only detailed account which has appeared is a record of events in London, which has a very grim significance on the question of the fore-knowledge in London of the tragedy of Serajevo.

Prof. Gooch has entirely overlooked the striking fact that the United States of America has never disclosed any of its archives concerning American diplomacy from 1895 to 1914. Nor does he seem aware of the sensational disclosures made at the Senate Committee on "the Causes of the United States entry into the World War," which sat under the Chairmanship of Senator Nye and concluded it deliberations in about the year 1938.

On the subject of aggression, Britain and the United States were the guilty parties in the two worst wars of aggression of last century, namely, the war against the Boer Republics, and the war by the United States against Spain in 1898, by which the United States took most of Spain's Colonial Empire.

The record of the United States in foreign policy has been one of continuous aggression against weak States in Europe, in Asia, and on the American Continent. After seizing the Spanish Colonies in the West Indies and in the Pacific, the United States next attacked the Republic of Colombia in 1904, to detach the Province of Panama from that Republic in order to construct the Panama Canal and retain a solely United States control. Between 1904 and 1914, the United States was continually endeavouring to undermine and wreck the Governments of various Republics in the Caribbean and in Central America. In 1915, the Danish West Indies were occupied by the United States by force and never returned, as the Faroe Islands and Iceland were jointly occupied by Britain and the United States in 1940.

The United States, Britain, and France carried on a war of aggression against the Soviet Republic from 1918 to 1920.

The United States and Britain were bullying Mexico and China throughout the whole period from 1919 till 1939. On several occasions the United States occupied by military force the capital of Nicaragua, and the United States was instrumental in engineering the revolution which put President Vargas in the position of Dictator of Brazil. Therefore, when Professor Gooch displays the United States and Britain in the role of champions vowed to defeat aggression, he is departing wholly from historical truth.

Professor Gooch then quotes the well-known declaration of King George to Mr. Page: "My God! Mr. Page, what else could we do," as though there was no answer to it in the existent circumstances. But the answer was simple. The British Government should have told the Russian Government that in no circumstances would Russia be supported in a war against Austria arising out of the Serajevo murders.

Lord Grey, however, was enmeshed in a policy of deceit, not against the German Government, but against the British people, his employers and paymasters. He had concealed the fact—indeed directly lied about it—that he had entered into secret arrangements with both France and Russia, which meant that Britain, whatever the cause, would be involved in any war which those countries chose to begin which would affect either Austria or Germany.

Yet the first, according to Mr. Asquith, who disclosed the documents in his "Genesis of the War," that the British knew about the terms (and extrordinary terms they were) of the Franco-Russian Alliance was in 1922! What can one say of the standard of public duty of a man like Grey, who placed himself and his colleagues in such a position. Even Machiavelli drew the line at treason against one's own state.

On the general subject of aggression, Professor Gooch, with all his learning and research, seems totally unacquainted with the little handbook issued by the British Foreign Office some sixty years ago entitled "Hostilities Without Declaration of War," which is a little bible on the subject of aggression. In the 150 examples given in that book, the German states appear only slightly concerned, which is another refutation of the stupidities of Lord Vansittart. It is unfortunate that Professor Gooch should have missed this little primer of the British Foreign Office as a reading of it might have prevented him taking the one-sided view he has done on this subject.

Herr Hitler, no doubt, has a long record of aggression; but he was a learner, a willing one probably, at the feet of many predecessors and contemporaries, few of whom were German.

Even in the case of Russia, well-informed people know that the German invasion of Russia in 1941 was prompted by the fact that Russia had become so alarmed in May 1940 by the progress of the German Armies in Europe that she was nerving herself for intervention, when the collapse of France took place, rendering any immediate intervention then futile and exceedingly dangerous. From that time, Germany and Russia were preparing against each other till Germany struck.

Passing to the general question of the morals of statesmanship, one finds that Professor Gooch is confused in his mind owing to his imagination overpowering his historical sense. He harps continually on the theme of aggression as represented by one set of statesmen and the principle of liberty as maintained by another set of statesmen. In fact, sometimes one is driven to doubt whether the Professor understands what is the measure of any true theory of liberty. He sees nothing odd in the disappearance of liberty of speech and writing in war-time. Yet, surely, war-time is the very period in which the true lover of liberty should assert his right to speak, think, and write freely on the ills which must flow from a declaration of war. Liberty in peace-time is the mere convention of a particular society. Liberty in war-time is the right to criticise men who have driven the ship of state on the rocks of destruction.

Professor Gooch is so hard-driven in this matter that he has committed himself to a statement which, on reflection, he must see is without foundation, in declaring: "In September, 1938, there were deep divisions in Parliament and the country; in September, 1939, there were none."

How comes it, then, that the war of 1939 is the first war in which a British Government has found it necessary to intern large numbers of Englishmen without trial, some of whom have held distinguished posts under the Crown, because of their opinions against the war? Why was it necessary to pass the Regulation forbidding any conversation about the war likely to cause despondency? Even the Pitt-Castlereagh Government never resorted to such stringent methods for the suppression of opinion against the Napoleonic War. Governments only resort to such methods when their conscience is uneasy on the subject of their policy.

The Left Wing intellectual school, to which apparently Mr. Gooch belongs, is in a sad plight in its whole attitude towards the war, which was strangely illustrated by a lecture given by Mr. Kingsley Martin, the editor of The New Statesman, at the Fabian Summer School in August, 1942, on the subject of "Propaganda in War-Time." The statements made in that address were of such a nature that the writer was constrained to ask whether the audience was to think that Mr. Kingsley Martin had abandoned any belief in the Latin maxim which, translated, runs: "Great is truth and it shall prevail." The reply was that he had never thought the maxim was true, but that the purpose of propaganda in politics was to convince the people that what one wished them to believe was the truth: a doctrine which seems closely akin to that enunciated by Herr Goebbels and Herr Hitler in their works on fooling the people.

Professor Gooch, in his optimistic survey of the liberal basis of politics and morals as applied in statecraft, is very convincing until the thought crosses the mind that his presentation of the case leaves unexplained the fact that 20 years after the Versailles Treaty and allied instruments the governments of the leading states of Europe had fallen into the hands of men like Chamberlain, Churchill, Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin, while the other great states in the world are controlled by men like Roosevelt, Chang-Kia-Shek, and Admiral Tojo.

The honesty of Mr. Roosevelt on the subject of aggression is well illustrated by his message to Congress on December 15th, 1941, when he had to explain how he, elected as a man who would keep the United States out of war, had plunged them into a worse war than President Wilson, who had been elected on a similar undertaking to the United States people, which he broke as rapidly as did President Roosevelt. This is the way in which President Roosevelt described the seizure of the Philippines as a result of the Spanish-American War, as aggressive a war against a weak state by a powerful one as could be imagined: "At the end of the nineteenth century the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands passed from Spain to this country." For simplicity of hypocrisy, one may doubt whether Uriah Heap ever surpassed that sentence.

The reason why Professor Gooch cannot account for the domination of the men named in the world is because, fundamentally, his whole outlook and philosophy of life is unsound. He has a dreamy view of a system of parliamentary government as representing the wishes of the people, whether in the House of Commons, in Congress, or in the French Chamber, which is an illusion.

Lord Acton, another great historian, perhaps the greatest true historian that the world will ever see, put his finger on the weakness of every known Parliamentary system in these sentences: "The men who pay wages ought not to be the political masters of those who earn them, for laws should be adapted to those who have the heaviest stake in the country, for whom misgovernment means not mortified pride and stinted luxury, but want, pain, degradation, and risk to their own lives and to their children's souls."

All Parliaments of whatever kind have been controlled by the men who pay wages, not by those who receive them. Professor Gooch, by overlooking that fact, has been plunged into a morass of political and moral misjudgment. Mr. Huxley gets at the heart of the matter in these words: "Great men have invariably failed to deliver the goods, but because we admire their qualities and envy their success we continue to believe in them and to submit to their power."

The goods great men never fail to deliver is a nice war. The trust of the credulous peoples of the world has been rewarded by Hitler, Chamberlain, Mussolini, Stalin, Tojo, Churchill, and Roosevelt with one of the finest specimens of war on record since Tamerlane ravaged Central Asia.

The British people are particularly unfortunate in their leader as he is one who is enjoying this war as he has enjoyed past wars. Morley recorded that Mr. Churchill was the one member of the Cabinet in 1914 who appeared to enjoy the prospect of war and would have been disappointed had Germany returned a favourable reply on the question of Belgium. Mr. Churchill did his best to embroil England with Soviet Russia on several occasions and with Turkey. He was anxious to turn the general strike of 1926 into a civil class war. He has turned the guns on the Indian people. He was an admirer of Herr Hitler, Signor Mussolini, and Senor Franco. He has pawned the possessions of England to the United States. His policy has been so disastrous that, unlike in the war of 1914-1918, it can be said that the British Empire has been already defeated, as it is admitted that, without the aid of the United States, there would be no prospect of overcoming the combination of Germany, Italy, and Japan, and recovering the territories which have been lost and preserving those which are in peril. He has attacked the Vichy Government as the Soviet Government was attacked in 1917, occupying French possessions as Russian possessions were seized in 1918.

In these circumstances, he had the audacity to tell the House of Commons on 8th September, 1942: "Since we were last together the tendencies of the war have continued to move in our favour." While the American Assistant Secretary of the Navy, speaking on September 24th, 1942, a little more frankly, put the position as being: "We are still losing the war. It will take all we have got to win." (Daily Herald, September 25.)

Matters have improved somewhat since then, but at an enormous cost, in men, materials, and money; most of the currencies of Europe being on the verge of collapse.

Mr. Huxley solves the difficulty that the writer has referred to as confronting Professor Gooch in two passages:

"Universal education has proved to be the state's most effective instrument of universal regimentation and militarisation and has exposed millions, hitherto immune, to the influence of organised lying and the allurements of incessant imbecile and debasing distractions. Even if the intentions of the various centralised state authorities were pacific, which they are not, industrialism would tend of its very nature to transform them into totalitarian governments. When the need for military efficiency is added to the need for industrial efficiency, totalitarianism becomes inevitable." (p. 247.)

And so the Socialists and working men of England find that the warning of Herbert Spencer that the centralisation of power in the State would mean slavery has come true, for the condition of the masses in Europe and England is little removed from slavery to-day in 1942, and, with the continuation of the war, will become indistinguishable from all elements of slavery except the one of purchase.

These books should be obtained from the public libraries and studied by all interested in international affairs. They should prove a corrective to that Chauvinism which is such a curious feature of discussions on international politics at Labour Conferences. It is always unwise to concentrate too much attention on the vices of others as our own virtues are not always conspicuous to the onlooker, even though we may be very conscious of them ourselves when rising to denounce the iniquities of foreign nations and proclaiming the virtues of our own.

ENDURING PEACE

NATIONAL PEACE COUNCIL DEFINES ALTERNATIVE TO THIRD WORLD WAR.

The thoughts of men everywhere are turned increasingly to the ending of the war. Is it to be the end of War also? Is the Peace to be real and lasting—outcome of a true fellowship between peoples — or once again, only an armistice—the prelude to an even vaster and more destructive conflict? On the answer to that question, the fate of a civilisation depends; that this is sober truth, the flying bomb—sign of things to come—provides eloquent evidence. Unless we end War, War will end us. Total Peace is the only sufficient answer to Total War.

If we are to end war, we must understand whence wars come and above all we must pay the price of peace. For this war has its roots in the failure to recognise the essential one-ness of mankind—to secure a full and free life for all men everywhere. Nazism and Fascism precipitated war but it was in the disorder of our civilisation that Nazism and Fascism were born.

To end war we must redeem this failure—we must achieve a genuine human society based not on privilege or oppression but on a sharing of benefits and obligations among all the peoples of the world. And paying the price means that each of us must be ready and eager for the radical reconstruction—spiritual, economic and political—which the achievement of such a world fellowship involves.

Building a common life for the world will take time—especially in face of the destructive effects of five years of war. "The abandonment of the use of force" to which, as the Atlantic Charter says, all nations must come "for realistic as well as spiritual reasons" may not be attainable at one bound. But we must commit ourselves to these tasks now. The peace-making must have a radical and constructive purpose from the beginning or it will fail. It has no hope of success if we begin by sowing the dragon's teeth of a third world war.

Support the National Petition and Campaign for a Constructive Peace.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED, believing that a world free from insecurity, injustice and war must be built not on conceptions of exclusive guilt, racial inferiority or preponderant power, but on the principle of the interdependence of all peoples and their common responsibility for the making of a peaceful order, and that a true security against war and aggression can be provided only by a positive policy which removes the causes of conflict; and believing further that such a policy calls for a radical reconstruction — spiritual, economic and political—which is rooted in responsible personal freedom, which subordinates sectional interests to the common well-being, and is directed to:

(a) the bringing of adequate relief to distressed peoples everywhere according to their need and the acceptance by those more favourably placed of the restrictions upon their own standards of living necessary for this purpose;

(b) the abolition of poverty and unemployment and the raising of standards, both economic and cultural, through the maximum use and equitable sharing of all available resources;

(c) the achievement of political and economic freedom for India and for all depedent peoples;

(d) the development within a wider co-operation of a closer unity between, and common services for, the peoples of Europe, as of other related areas;

(e) the international control of armaments to ensure their progressive reduction in all countries in conjunction with the transfer of world resources to productive uses;

(f) the promotion of education in the responsibilities of world citizenship; and

(g) the setting-up of the international organisations necessary to the fulfilment of these tasks and the limiting of national sovereignities in order to render their work effective, pray His Majesty's Government to formulate such a programme of constructive peace-making, to put it into action at home as fully and as speedily as possible, and to commend it vigorously in the international field as the necessary basis for an enduring peace.

If in agreement, please write to the National Peace Council, 144 Southampton Row, London, W.C.1, and indicate your willingness to sign this form and to support in every way the campaign for an enduring peace against a third world war.

"HABEAS CORPUS" MANIFESTO

18B internment is merely a war-time suspension of Habeas Corpus.

In our September and November issues reference was made to the protest signed by Francis, Fifth Duke of Bedford, and four other peers, in May, 1794, against the war-time suspension of "Habeas Corpus."

The manifesto read: "Dissentient," that is opposed to the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill:—

Firstly, Because no evidence has been laid before us that this Kingdom is at present in those circumstances of imminent danger and imperious necessity, which alone, in our opinion, would justify even the temporary surrender of that sacred fundamental law which is the sole guardian of the personal liberty and security of our fellow subjects. None of these circumstances, either of foreign invasion, or of formidable conspiracy now exist, which induced our ancestors to commit their liberties to the perilous guardianship of a despotical authority. Instead of such an unequivocal public danger which silences all deliberations and over-rules all laws, we are now required to vest an arbitrary power in his Majesty's Ministers upon the authority of a detail of the offences of individuals or societies, whose strength and numbers are not proved, to our apprehension, to be such as would justify such a measure as the present, especially as the ordinary operations of the law are sufficient to check the spirit which is supposed to prevail. One of the worst effects of the conduct of these societies, is their having operated as the instrument for former artificial panics, and as a pretext for former measures, in our opinion, the most hazardous and pernicious. They continued the same conduct without injury experienced by the public, without accession of strength, without the proof of any change in their systems or designs. We cannot ,therefore, without betraying the trust reposed in us, consent to resign the liberties of all our fellow subjects to the discretion of the servants of the Crown, on no better ground than that of a catalogue of offences which have been long notorious to the whole Kingdom.

Secondly, Because even the proof that some individuals entertain those desperate designs which have been ascribed to them would not, in our opinion, form any justification of the present measure. From the Revolution to the complete defeat of the pretentions of the House of Stuart, the wisdom of our ancestors did not deem the existence of a zealous, powerful and indefatigable Jacobite party a sufficient reason, without overt acts of rebellion, or actual existing conspiracy, for subjecting the personal liberty of the whole Kingdom to the will of ministers. Miserable indeed, and precarious is our condition, if, at the pleasure of a handful of visionaries and incendiaries (characters which every age produces, and disguises which the agents of every government may assume) our liberties are to be laid under a legal interdict, and ministers are to be vested with an arbitrary power over the persons of all the freemen of this realm.

Thirdly, Because even if the danger had been as real and imminent as is pretended, it might have been provided against by measures far less odious than that of depriving the subject of those rights of personal security which distinguishes the British Constitution beyond any other free government, ancient or modern, and changing it for the time from a government of law to a government of will. One expedient comparatively more moderate is obvious, namely, to put the law respecting bail for misdemeanours which affect the state, for a limited time on the same footing with bail in cases of treason.

Fourth, Because this bill appears to us under a still more melancholy and alarming aspect when we combine it with declarations which have been made by considerable persons during the dependance of this bill. Even this, the utmost extremity to which our ancestors were ever driven by the pressure of the greatest danger, is but the prelude to a system of measures (if possible) still more violent and arbitrary.

These menaces too forcibly illustrated by some past measures, in our opinion of a vigour equally impolitic and odious, fill us with the most melancholy apprehensions that designs are entertained by a progressive series of encroachments to annihilate all the rights of Englishmen, and to extinguish all the free principles of the British Constitution.

Fifth, Because the precipitation with which this bill has been hurried through the House is both indecent in itself, and directly repugnant to two standing orders of this House, one of the 28th of June, 1715, and the other of the 20th of April, 1699, standing orders, which ensure to this House the advantages of mature deliberation, and to the subject the invaluable privilege of petitioning against measures which, like the present, are subversive of his fundamental rights.

Just as Aldred's name was used, without rhyme or reason, in London by the Crown before the Advisory Committee, to justify the wrongful internment and deportation of Milly Witcop, so it was used in Edinburgh by the Crown to secure and to justify a vicious distinction sentence in the Maxton case.

The Glasgow Evening Citizen, among other papers, on May 11, 1916, reported the trial, in the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, of "the three young Glasgow Socialists—James Dunlop MacDougall, James Maxton, and Jack Smith," in answer to charges under the Defence of the Realm Act. All three accused were charged with inciting the workers to strike, and having thus attempted to impede, delay, and restrict the production of war material. The report stated that the trial "did not last long." It was not a very heroic case. The accused were represented by counsel and pleaded guilty. Why the movement had to pay counsel to plead guilty, and following on this exhibition of silence, had to decide that a man who was so defended, was a good Socialist spokesman to send to Parliament, must remain for ever one of the mysteries of working-class struggle and study in Socialist careerism. This is written as honest comment and without any personal antagonism to Maxton. It is sound criticism and a reasonable question.

Maxton and MacDougall were sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment each and Smith was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment.

Concerning Smith, the then Lord Advocate said :—

Prisoner was apparently an associate of Guy Aldred, who edited a paper called "The Spur," which contained articles of an extremely revolutionary character.

So Jack Smith received six months' extra imprisonment because he knew Guy Aldred.

The suggestion that he was the inspirer of revolt and conspiracy was made once more by the Government in connection with the strike that took place at Wandsworth Prison after he had been released from it under the Cat and Mouse Act. Mr. Albion Richardson, C.B.E., M.P., was appointed by the Home Secretary, on March 11, 1919, to hold an inquiry into the allegations made against Major Blake, the Acting-Governor of Wandsworth Prison. His report, dated April 2, 1919, was issued as a White Paper (Cmd. 131), on May 7, 1919. The report was summarised and reviewed in these columns for April, 1940. In The New Leader, for September 18, 1936, Fenner Brockway referred to the revolt at Wandsworth being led by Guy Aldred. It seems a pity that, at the time the struggle actually was taking place the I.L.P. and the No Conscription Fellowship could not support it with publicity, which was needed so urgently. Only George Lansbury, in The Herald, supported Aldred's struggle. But Lansbury, whatever his faults, always rallied to the side of the weak, the neglected, and the oppressed. Aldred protested against Richardson's report and Major Blake's attack in the Press. Here is an extract from The Star, London, for May 13, 1919 :—

MR. GUY ALDRED.

Mr. Guy Aldred writes to "The Star" in regard to the report upon the Wandsworth Prison strike to point out that he was not a prisoner there at the time that Major Blake was appointed Acting Governor of the Prison.

Major Blake had admitted that he had applied the term "Bolshevist" to Mr. Aldred, who argues that this description, in his absence from the gaol, was "quite gratuitous."

In June 1920, Rose Witcop identified herself with the Birth Control propaganda of Margaret Sanger. Aldred was in favour of birth control knowledge being circulated, but he was not interested personally in birth control activity. He held that the right of access to birth control knowledge was the inalienable right of the citizen and that no Government had the right to prevent the wide circulation of such knowledge.

After Aldred's release from Barlinnie in 1922, his interests and those of Rose Witcop grew apart in these matters. She definitely concentrated on Margaret Sanger's work to the exclusion of the Anarchist and Socialist propaganda with which Aldred was concerned. Their interests became opposed.

In January 1923, they were prosecuted for publishing Margaret Sanger's pamphlet on Family Limitation. The real publisher was Rose Witcop, but Aldred accepted joint responsibility. The West London Magistrate ordered the destruction of this work, and the case was appealed to the London Sessions and was heard on February 9. Sir Richard Muir appeared for the Crown and Lort Williams, K.C., M.P., and Mr. St. John Hutchinson for Rose Witcop. Aldred defended in person. The conviction was upheld, although the Crown and the Court admitted the good intentions of the accused and exonerated them from all suspicion of unclean or unworthy motives. Aldred was in favour of appealing by way of Stated Case to the High Court. But the author objected, and so he did not press the matter, although he would have appeared in person. A year later Guy Aldred and Rose Witcop parted company.

In April 1924, Aldred was involved in a Free Speech fight at Botanic Gardens, Glasgow, and in June 1924, in the Glasgow Green Free Speech fight for unlicensed meeting. Both cases were taken to the High Court by Aldred, by Bill of Suspension in the first case, and Stated Case in the Glasgow Green issue. Aldred argued his appeals in person and lost. But a ruling of the Court in the Glasgow Green case prepared the way for a later and successful struggle. In connection with the Glasgow Green fight occurred the famous Paisley Road disturbance which led to amazing proceedings in the Govan Police Court.

On Sunday, February 15, 1925, Aldred was arrested from the platform in Hyde Park and charged with blasphemy and sedition. Reference was made to this case in these columns for November 1942. At the time great press publicity was given to the charges and the meetings. Aldred was featured as an outstanding blasphemer and seditioner in the Daily Mail and other papers. He continued to address meetings in Hyde Park. The charges would not bear analysis and ended on March 10, 1925, with the Magistrate dismissing all the charges except one, and imposing a fine of £2, somewhat apologetically. He thanked Aldred for his manner of evidence and conduct of the case and indicated that he did not believe the police evidence on vital points.

The Special Branch of the C.I.D. now commenced to harass Rose Witcop and to threaten her with deportation to Russia. After challenging the validity of her union with Aldred, and ignoring the fact that she had a son born in 1909, the Home Office served a deportation order on her and refused to postpone its operation to permit her to appeal to the Court of Session. The result was that an irregular marriage was registered before the Sheriff at Glasgow, on February 2, 1926. This was reported widely and commented upon in the ordinary press. The Daily Record, Glasgow, published interviews with both the parties concerned and gave a very fair statement of the position in its columns the following day.

In January 1929, Aldred issued a printed denunciation of John Wheatley, M.P., for appearing at Shettleston on the same platform as Arthur Henderson, M.P., in view of Henderson's membership of the Cabinet responsible for the death of James Connolly. As a result, the meeting was interrupted with protests. Aldred and 12 other men and four women—including his comrade Jane Patrick, who had been sentenced with him in 1921—were arrested. Aldred delayed the trial by raising preliminary objections and taking a Bill of Advocation. In due course, conviction and nominal fines were imposed.

In 1931, Aldred resumed with others, including John McGovern, M.P., the struggle for unlicensed speech on Glasgow Green. In July he held up proceedings by taking a Stated Case. The meetings on the Green continued and commanded large support. On Thursday, November 6, 1931, the High Court of Justiciary upheld the convictions, but reduced the fine, and sustained Aldred's objection to the permits. The result was the passage of a new bye-law, authorising the Council to set apart meeting grounds in all the public parks. This bye-law the Labour and Socialist Council has failed to implement.

Rose Witcop died at London on July 6, 1932, and was cremated at Golder's Green.

In July, 1936, Aldred commenced an intensive series of meetings throughout Glasgow, at street corners, on behalf of the Spanish workers' struggle against Fascism. Between July and October he issued 19 mimeographed leaflets, headed Regeneracion. As a result of this campaign, the C.N.T.-F.A.I. invited his comrades, Jane H. Patrick and Ethel Mac-

BIRTH CONTROL APPEAL DISMISSED

Sir W. Arbuthnot Lane giving evidence when the appeal against an order that a book on family limitation should be destroyed was heard at the London Sessions yesterday. Sir William, the great surgeon, said he could not understand why the poor should be deprived of the knowledge the rich possessed. Donald to go to Barcelona. These comrades left Glasgow on October 20, 1936. Comrade Patrick went from Barcelona to Madrid, where she served on the Committee of Defence, and returned to Barcelona just in time for the famous or infamous May Days. She returned to Glasgow on May 24, 1937, and described conditions then existing in Spain in an interview published in the Glasgow Weekly Herald on May 29. Ethel MacDonald remained in Barcelona and was arrested by the reactionary "Communist" junta that came into power following the May days. Her letters describing her experiences, were published in the Glasgow Evening Times, between June and September, 1937. She left Barcelona on September 3, under escort. After making some European Socialist and Anarchist contacts, she reached Glasgow, on November 7. Subsequently she returned to Paris and worked in the Anarchist movement there until just before the outbreak of war.

The letters of his comrades, Patrick and MacDonald were published by Aldred in May 15, 1937, as Barcelona Bulletin. This was the first description of the tragic events in Barcelona to reach the outside world. They were reproduced in American papers and also translated and circulated by comrades in France.

Ethel MacDonald brought from Spain a rare collection of documents, papers, posters, photographs, Government declarations. The collection was non-partisan for it represented all factions. These she presented later to the Mitchell Library and they have been placed in the Jeffrey Room for the use of students of the Spanish struggle. This collection is probably the most complete collection of documents relating to this period of Spain extant in Britain.

In November, 1938, Aldred challenged the restrictions on public meetings at Hyde Park and carried the case on appeal from Marlborough Street Police Court to the High Court of King's Bench. No public support was forthcoming and the appeal was lost. Yet Socialists still protest against the suppression of literature circulated in and around the Hyde Park meetings.

On January 7, 1943, Aldred was ordained a minister of the Humanist Society of Friends.

On November 15, 1943, Aldred received the degree of Doctor of Laws from the Pacific International University, of Los Angeles, California, U.S.A.

When the Second World War was declared, and the present Duke of Bedford, then Marquess of Tavistock, took his stand for pacifism, Aldred identified himself with the Duke's opposition to war.

An admirer of Richard Carlile, Guy Aldred has decided that his body shall be used, after death, for the purposes of scientific research. To this end, he has willed it to the Medical School of the Glasgow University, and made the Chancellor and Court of the University his executors, as regards this section of his will. Concerning the disposition (according to Scots Law) of his body, the will is a carefully drawn document, which he has composed, having in mind the absurd and unnecesary restrictions of the Anatomy Act, 1832 (Act 2 and 3, Will 4.c75, section 9).

The Scottish Sunday Express, for June, 1944, featured his determination in this matter in a news item headed :—

SCIENCE WILL GET HIS BODY
MR. ALDRED IS HAPPY NOW.
"Sunday Express" Reporter

Guy Aldred, political figure and editor, is a public-spirited Glasgow citizen who holds the welfare of his fellow-man very dear.

When he heard that anatomy research was being hindered by a dearth of bodies, he immediately offered his own to the Medical School of Glasgow University.

Professor D. M. Blair, Professor of Anatomy at the University replied: "The offer is very welcome. But the trouble is that no one can legally bequeath his body for any purpose; he can only express an intention which his executor or next of kin may eventually set aside."

A sheaf of forms came from the Government's inspector of anatomy. They told Mr. Aldred that "a hearse with a shell for the removal of the body will be sent on the date mentioned by the executor."

They explained that "burial is conducted by a clergyman of the faith which the deceased professed during his life."

"This," agrees Mr. Aldred, "is fine."

But he disagrees that any one else should have a say in the disposal of his body.

Mr. Aldred is a determined man. Any one else might have accepted the conditions laid down in the forms from the inspector of anatomy. But after going to so much trouble to give his body to science, Mr. Aldred is not going to be foiled—even after he dies.

"I've drafted a legal document and sent it to Professor Blair. It makes the medical school my executor for that part of my will which bequeathes my body."

That, as Mr. Aldred maintains, should fix it.

HYDE PARK CHARGE

Guy Alfred Aldred (carrying coat) leaving Marlborough-street police-court after he had been remanded yesterday on a charge of using expressions during a public address in Hyde Park that were calculated to provoke a breach of the peace.—(Daily Mirror.)

Reproduced, same size, from "The Daily Mirror," Northern or Glasgow edition, February 17, 1925. The London edition published the same picture, beneath the heading:: "Breach of Rules Charge Against Park Orator."

This was illustrated with a picture of the editor—taken in Hyde Park in 1938—walking across the street, carrying the captions :—"Guy Aldred," "Determination did it." Perhaps this amusing, but not unfriendly comment, sums up the entire struggle of witnessing for heresy, commonwealth and anti-militarism, in a world of shams, war and exploitation.

The touch about this being fine is a satirical statement of what Aldred might have said. Actually he never said it, for Aldred really believes in no burial or cremation service. He does not mind the relations of a deceased person assembling and uttering friendly platitudes if it cheers them : but he does not see the necessity for it. He favours silence rather than speech.

TO "CONCHIES."

Your country calls you lily-livered cowards
Because your conscience tells you not to kill;
Or else your fellows think you simple-minded
Because you wish your "enemies" no ill.

They think you selfish, weak, unpatriotic,
Because, although your country you would serve,
From principles of decency and justice
And deep humanity, you will not swerve.

You're willing to be held in cheap derision,
Misunderstood, thrown out of work or home;
You're willing, if needs be, to go to prison—
Because you won't help bomb Berlin or Rome!

But hold your hearts high, citizens of England,
Your love for England is far-sighted, strong;
'Tis true you cannot serve her as a soldier
Because you know that WAR is simply WRONG.

But you CAN build, and work, and live for England,
Yes, work for all mankind till wars shall cease;
Take courage, friends, look forward to the future—
Prepare yourselves to live, or die, for PEACE.

LANARKSHIRE ACTIVITY

The Duke of Bedford addressed a big U.P.C. meeting at the Geneva Rooms, Glasgow, on Saturday evening, December 9. A keen discussion followed. Next morning he addressed the Study Circle and met with keen and interested questioning. On the Sunday evening he spoke at the Central Halls and had an enthusiastic reception. He returned to Lanarkshire the following week and attended an Anarchist reception at Burnbank on the Saturday. On the Sunday, he spoke in the Hamilton Co-operative Hall. There was a full audience and keen questioning. Before leaving Glasgow on the Monday, he attended a private conference of Pacifist ministers, mostly of the Church of Scotland.

The editor addressed the Glasgow University Union Dialetic Study on Thursday, November 23. He survived the preliminary ragging and got home his views in reply to much questioning. He wanted to speak on "Education and Individual," and did partly develop his theme. The students, however, insisted on questions on Anarchism, Pacifism, and the Duke of Bedford's anti-war attitude: all of which he answered, although they were irrelevant.

The following Thursday evening, the editor spoke to a small meeting of the Polish Students' Association in their rooms at Crown Circus. Nationalism, Power Politics, Anarchism, and Education were discussed, and further meetings and contacts are planned.

On December 12, the editor addressed a meeting of the blind in their hall in Rotten Row, on "Socialism and War," and was invited to address further meetings.

On Friday, December 22, a Social was held in the Y.M.C.A. Hall, Motherwell, at which the Socialists of Lanarkshire gathered to honour our comrade, W. E. Currie, for his splendid and untiring work in the social struggle. Anarchists, I.L.P.'ers, and Labourists were present and spoke. Comrade Currie replied to the presentation. A full report will appear in our next issue.

TO A BROADCASTING POLITICIAN.

Loud-braying ass! I wonder that you dare
With dull, dishonest gabbling soil the air
Which, but a moment gone, all trembling, bore
The silver glory of a Mozart score.
O, that my radio, bereft of choice,
Must follow Mozart's music with your voice!
But mouth your mealiest, spout your bragging lay!
There is, thank God, a very simple way
(I use the fitting phrase) to "shut your trap"—
I quickly turn a knob—you're cut off—SNAP!
Now Mozart's memories from the silence creep,
The quiet air quivers thankfully to sleep.

—IVAN BEUTTLER.

We have been asked to deal with Greece and Poland and will do so thoroughly in our next issue. The situation in both countries illustrate the menace of power politics; the inability of militarism to cure militarism; the absurdity of Socialists allying themselves with militarism: and the ever-present threat of a third world war unless we arrest war now by destroying militarism once and for all.

NOTES AND COMMENTS
BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The people of Holland and Norway are reported to be enduring very serious privations. All of these could have been prevented by a negotiated peace some months ago, just as they could now be mitigated swiftly and very substantially by the same method. At whose door does responsibility for their continued sufferings lie? Mr. Churchill's "victory" goes on receding with the steady persistence of a rainbow end. "No one knows," he cheerfully remarked on November 29, "when the German war will be finished, and still less how long the interval will be between the defeat of the Germans and the defeat of the Japanese." If at long last we do catch up with the rainbow, what shall we find? A pot of money or a spot of trouble? For the present, anyhow, we are sure of blood and still more blood—for what gain? The belief seems to be becoming general that Stalin will soon declare war on Japan, whom (shades of Finland!) he is said to have termed an aggressor nation. Such a declaration of war would doubtless be very welcome to the British and American Governments, and would materially shorten the struggle in the Far East. It would, however, be a completely amoral act, and all that could be said in excuse would be that it was no worse than the action of President Roosevelt in goading Japan into war by economic sanctions in order to embroil the somewhat reluctant American nation with the Western Axis Powers; and perhaps, also, it would be no worse than the policy the Japanese Government itself might have pursued had the positions been reversed. Still an amoral act it would remain—power politics naked and unashamed, ruthless, treacherous and greedy as all power-politics are. If Russia had been really shocked by Japan's aggression, why wait until she was obviously outnumbered before declaring war? Why did the British and American Governments also delay so long their threats and hostile economic action? Power politics of this kind may give a group of nations victory, but they can never give the world peace.

On November 15th, Mr. R. Purbrick, member for Walton, asked the Secretary of State for Air whether, in view of the attacks on civilians in England and with the object of destroying German civilian morale, he will arrange now to bomb Dresden, Breslau, Madgeburg, and other large centres of civilian population that have not already been heavily bombed. The electorate of Walton are to be congratulated on having such a fine type of Christian gentleman to represent them, who is in all respects so different from a brutal Nazi! Mr. Purbrick's address in Vacher's Parliamentary Companion appears to be "The Kennels." It might have been "The Lair."

Reliable information about the Continent, not obtained through the usual propaganda channels, is scarce and always interesting. The other day a friend wrote to me: "It appears that the Polish people were misled by the Allies, who first asked them to mobilise, then to demobilise; and then left them with barely half their effective army to face the Germans. The Russians came in bearing banners, asking the population not to resist as they were liberators, but in spite of this, outside the main towns, the Russians were waging war with as much ferocity as the Germans. Shortly after they occupied the country they put the Poles into prison camps in which many of them died. A great number were deported to Siberia to work in the mines and some escaped to recount their sufferings at the hands of the Russians. During the period of peace between Russia and Germany, a great number of Poles were exchanged by the Germans for food and fuel. These men were also sent by the Russians to work in the mines under terribly severe conditions. There has never been much difference between the treatment of the Poles by the two Great Powers, and of the two Germany acted the better in most respects."

Another friend has told me that in a certain large Government Department in which he recently worked, he did not manage to discover a single highly-placed official who was a man both of character and principle. There were strong men with no principles and weak men with principles, but no one capable of putting his foot down and insisting that justice and the honour of the Crown must be observed. I have had very similar reports from other sources. It is what one would expect in a war of this kind, but it is not exactly a cheerful outlook for the country!

Having liberated the Greeks, we are now (December 5th) engaged in fighting some of them. In explaining the situation, Mr. Churchill has said in the House of Commons: "It would be very much easier for us to stand aside and allow everything to degenerate, as it would very quickly, into anarchy or Communist dictatorship." Tut! Tut! What will Stalin say to this? Would not Mr. Churchill have been better advised to change round and start backing the other horse?

General de Gaulle said in Paris a little while ago that, while the Allies are militarily united, in other respects "They are States each one of whom, while fighting the same enemies as we (the French), pursues its own interests and makes its own policies." I had noticed something of the same kind myself, but wondered if it could be due to my possessing the morbid mind of a disgruntled pacifist!

In Berneri's "Workers in Stalin's Russia" it is stated that in the strictly-disciplined military academies which are now a feature of the country, boys are taught to have a high regard for "the honour of the school." "You may drive out nature with a pitchfork," wrote Virgil, "but she will always come back again." So, also, it seems, will the Old School Tie!

Forward of December 9th contains an excellent exposure of a first-prize atrocity story. Four German boys, according to some of our newspapers, had been captured and were to be tried by Court Martial because they had fired on American soldiers. The Daily Express was most vitriolic on the subject of these depraved little Nazis; many correspondents wrote suggesting that they should be shot, and Lord Vansittart himself came out in full eruption stating that "these young hooligans should be deported to some island reformatory and kept there till they were reliably reformed." In the end it was admitted that the boys had merely found a discarded rifle which one of them fired at a sandbag, much to the alarm of himself and his companions as they did not realise it was loaded!

The American paper, The Progressive, which, though not pacifist, well deserves its title and makes refreshing reading, has some good criticisms of the Dumbarton Oaks Conference. It points out that, whereas the Conference suggested the creation of an Assembly of "all peace-loving States," the Assembly was not given a single grant of power, all control being lodged with the Security Council, which was completely under the thumb of the Great Powers, Russia, the United States and Britain, with China as a somewhat nominal fourth partner. Although the Conference believed in using force to restrain aggression, such restraint was not to be put into operation unless the "Big Four" were in agreement. This meant that if one of them decided to behave as an aggressor, the others must not interfere! Even the League of Nations, of lamented memory, started with a much better chance of success than what the writer of the article in The Progressive aptly describes as "The great Dumbarton Hoax."

The Progressive also contains an excellent article by a Mr. Milton Mayer. Mr. Mayer is a Jew of German origin and he ably criticises another Jew, also of German origin, Mr. Morganthau, Secretary to the United States Treasury, who, besides being one of the pillars of Big Finance, recently put forward a plan for the destruction of German industry. Mr. Mayer, naturally enough, is extremely anti-Nazi, but his strong feeling does not deprive him of the capacity for sound judgment. In his article he says, "I set myself to restraining my parochial hatred of the Nazis, as a Jew, and to hate them for all I was worth as a human being. My effort enabled me, and enables me now, to see clearly that all Germans are not Nazis and that, even if they were, they would not be improved by being subjected to Nazi treatment by their foreign conquerors. I am able to see clearly, as Henry (Morganthau) is not, that all conscious, freely-acting Nazis are bad because their ideals are bad; but we cannot say that all Germans are bad, any more than Hitler can say that all Jews are bad, for some Germans and Jews have good ideals and some have bad." Mr. Mayer goes on: "You and Henry may say, 'Yes, indeed, it will enrage them (i.e., the Germans, if their industries are destroyed), but without their machinery and land and mines they will be impotent!' . . . I can see that they will be militarily impotent, but I cannot drive out of my head the grinning threat of the demoniacal Goebbels that if the Nazis are defeated, they will win anyway, for the Nazi ideas will permeate the hearts of the victors. I am afraid that Morganthau's heart is permeated and I do not want to live in a Nazi world, not even if it is Henry's.

"No, my fellow Americans. Henry's plan is too practical for me. 'With malice towards none, with charity towards all,' is more my line. I know the doctrine of Judeo-Christian forgiveness is a lot of damned sentimental nonsense, and the only reason I have for calling it to the attention of the President's Cabinet Committee is that, impractical as it is, it seems to be the only thing that stands a Chinaman's chance of working."

MURDER OF A POET

They came upon him sitting in his room,
Dreaming glorious dreams he was of Spring,
He did not hear them for the choirs of birds
That were singing in the forests of his brain.

They came upon him stealthily like beasts,
Men who ne'er had paled at sight of beauty,
Nor sang a verse of purest lyric gold.

Came upon him, eyes of flashing hate,
Looking down on his fair young head, and curved back.

When their eyes met no word at all was spoken,
But the scorn for him was on their bestial lips,
He smiled at them defiant and unafraid.

Four shots rang out. He fell without a moan,
No more to sing of beauty, or to praise
The martyrs who had bled for Freedom's cause.

They laughed and went their way,
"Another swine!" they said, "that will not guide
The masses to another life than ours!"

Down the lamp-lit street they went,
Marching and saluting, bold and proud
That they had rid the world of one more Red.

Their leader smiled and said, "He was a poet?
'Tis well you found him out, I do not like
His kind, they have a roving mind."

He gave them medals for their manly breasts,
And never were there men so proud as they.

The while the blood was soaking through
The last sweet song the lad had written
An hour before they came.

Just two short verses of the joy of Spring,
And the freedom that should belong to all men,
Two little verses that will live through the years
Long after the last dictator is dead and gone.

DON'T STOP HALFWAY OBJECTOR

BY "GOWRIE"

A question I heard asked at a public meeting not long ago showed that the questioner was at a loss to understand why the Government was so "down" on Jehovah's Witnesses as objectors to military service. I was reminded of something I learned after the last war, for like many others I had no real understanding of the meaning of Socialism when as a young man I refused to take part in the slaughter of 1914-1918.

It may surprise many of the younger generation to-day to learn that there was once a Socialist daily paper running in these islands. It was called the Daily Herald, and at the time of which I write, about 1920, the editor was a man named George Lansbury. Among the regular contributors was a talented humourist, who wrote under the pen-name of "Gadfly." One of his articles—the Salvation Army was the subject—had raised a storm, and letters, of varying degrees of support and dissension, poured in to the Editorial Office.

One letter from a pioneer Socialist put the matter in a different perspective and led me, for one, a little nearer to a realisation of the way things are done in this capitalistic imperialist country of ours. The writer's theme was that when the ruling class realise that any movement which springs from the people has significance or is growing in popularity, they, the possessing, investing, ruling class set out to capture that movement, and in nine cases out of ten succeed. The Salvation Army was cited as a case in point.

Now I have tested this theory over a number of years. All manner of movements and societies—and this country is honeycombed with them—have come under the microscope, and I have found it surprisingly correct. The older established societies, associations, movements, groups, clubs, missions, have been long safely in the fold. Whether the more recent starters, the Youth Hostel Movement, the Spinsters' Association, the Old Age Pensioners' Association and many others, are maintaining their independence or not, I have no knowledge, but if the old men don't watch out, they'll be finding a Union Jack in their meeting room and will be terminating their gatherings with the National Anthem. Readers of The Word may judge for themselves as to whether any body they may be interested in has become, in the term used by the writer of the letter, "nobbled."

Not only does this apply to organisations. Our rulers know how to "cash in" on personal popularity in the realm of sport, and particularly in the entertainment world. Of such great use are certain popular entertainers that they can easily command greater salaries than archbishops or cabinet ministers.

And what happens to movements which have a certain following and which refuse to be "used" in the interests of the ruling class? The capitalist state, being the executive committee of the ruling class comes down on such with a heavy hand. Those who refuse to conform to state requirements in time of war they smite, and smite hard. Ask the Jehovah's Witnesses.

THE WAR GAME.

Many young objectors of the last war, high principled idealists, were appalled and horrified at the vehemence and the venom of a wartime public opinion which was directed against them. The ostracism, the taunts and the persecution of the present war have been nothing compared with 1916-1919. Not that they did not expect something of the kind, but it came from quarters from which they thought their attitude to war might have been more reasonably understood. They had not then learned that practically all the means of moulding the popular mind are in the hands of those who are in possession of economic power. They did not realise that they had committed an unpardonable offence in resisting the conscription laws, laws which are the master stroke of the ruling class to keep the workers in subjection.

So thoroughly was the poisoning of opinion carried on that for years afterwards C.O.'s met with ostracism and the refusal of work in all walks of life. We can be sure that after the present war, organisations like the British Legion will do their utmost, by means of "Indignant Soldier's Wife" letters to the local press all over the country, to keep public opinion prejudiced against objectors and to prevent them from getting work.

Large numbers who had taken their stand on religious or humanitarian grounds were impelled to get the truth of this hate phenomenon, and so came to a better understanding of the main causes of modern war, of the reasons why the state demands subservience at all costs, and of the need to be equipped with knowledge as well as the duty to follow religious or ethical conviction and the human call of goodwill to men.

Such a revulsion to war will follow the present instalment as has never been known before. It will have nothing to do with any party or any "ism," but will come right out of the people, who have endured the hardships, the torments and the sorrows of these years. Does any C.O. look for some form of service to which he can devote his own time? Let him equip himself to denounce and debunk the war game; show it up for the vile thing it is. For game it is, a game in which the workers always lose. Never has there been such abundant material.

THE COMMON PEOPLE.

After the disillusionment which follows "victory," and a return to the same old conditions of living, only worse, there will come a mood in which the people will be ready and eager to listen, and support will be forthcoming from unexpected quarters. Not always will the millions now in uniform be silenced by distance and censorship and military law.

Let each give his or her talent in the struggle, a talent cultivated and developed for a purpose. It is more effective than wealth. To aim only at a fine house with garden and car is to cut one's self off from the great forward urge of life.

Our hopes for the future must rest with the commonpeople of all lands. This we have often heard in speeches and often read in our anti-war papers. Against it we have the solid fact that there has never been any conversion of the majority of a people. All the changes have been brought about by energetic minorities. We ought to know the "common people." We move among them. We know what a hold tradition and family sentiment has on them; how strong is the disinclination to do anything which may not have the approval of neighbours. Has not almost every house got enlarged photographs on the parlour walls of members of the family in the uniform of the last war? Don't we know what an easy prey they are to the militarists—easier to-day perhaps than ever before? Have we not realised the truth of Bernard Shaw's words, that the governing classes keep the mass of the people enslaved by taking advantage of their sloth, their stupidity, their poverty, their narrowness, their superstition and their vices? But times of upheaval come along, and sheer force of circumstances compels people to think on different lines, to get below their previous surface, to listen to voices they had formerly disregarded, and to question authorities they once respected. Those who have stood out against war must be ready to help in guiding such an awakening force along lines which can lead to the people's real liberation.

SAVE THE CHILDREN.

And of greater importance than the adults and the aged will be the children. A world-wide slogan arose in 1919 as the nations realised the extent of the devastation and the appalling state of the surviving human beings. It was "Save the Children." Save them from the diseases which spread across the war-ravaged countries like a plague; from the famine caused by the blockade and other means of warfare used by the Christian nations of Europe. In spite of all the efforts made, millions of children perished, while others grew up deformed for life as a result of the starvation and disease which had been their lot during the war.

All that must happen again. Years must be spent in rescue and rehabilitation work, as a natural consequence of the present war. But the slogan will have another meaning for us to-day. Most of us remember the pictures which were published in the daily papers a few years ago showing the school children of Germany and Italy, dressed in military uniforms, drilled and regimented and imbued with the ideal of the supremacy of military service. We remember the horror and disgust to which our national papers gave expression. Yet this is what is happening to the school children throughout these islands to-day. It is what we are told our children must undergo in the future, not only in the "national interest" and for the "peace of the world," but for their own good. Politicians, militarists, industrialists, education experts and archbishops point out the absolute necessity for this in post-war Britain.

Do we need more examples as to where militarism leads a nation than the present state of Italy, Germany and France?

"Save the Children" will need to be our slogan in this country as well as the call to rescue and support the starving millions in Europe and Asia. Save them from the militarised state. Save them from the reactionaries whose idea of education is that the children of the working classes should be clever at saluting. These people have been in the saddle long enough. If they are unchallenged, a generation will grow up relieved of the necessity of thinking for themselves.

At the present stage of "civilisation's" evolution, nothing is more sinister than the prospect which is in front of the young children of to-day, the prospect of state-moulded lives, open to all the perils of dictatorship—England's subtle kind—and closed to the real principles of freedom and the full development of individual personality, for which so many great and fearless souls in the past have sacrificed liberty and life. Don't stop halfway, objector.

DUMBARTON HOAX.

They've completed their task at Dumbarton
(To plan the new world) the big three,
And already, no doubt, made a start on—
What's brewing for you and for me.
The acorns they've sown (so they tell us)
Will grow into powerful oaks
To strangle at last casus bellus
(Ein Reich und ein Fuhrer und volks),
With excellent chances
Of spreading their branches
To shelter all sensible blokes.

There'll be room for the Hammer and Sickle,
The bourgeoisee, too, and the Church,
And also the Dollar (or Nickel)
Will find there a permanent perch.
Side by side 'neath their shade we will gather,
Sharing vodka and beer and spam,
For the Left and the Right close together
Shall lie down like the lion and lamb,
With provision to please us
From Karl Marx to Jesus
(On both sides of our bread there'll be jam).

There is only one fly in the ointment,
But that is a trifling affair;
The lion may growl disappointment,
And the eagle may peck at the bear,
If the seeds that were broadcast this autumn
Should later be proved somewhat mixed
And are not really quite what we thought 'em
(Alas! every genus is fixed).
For my personal fash* is
The "oaks" may turn "ashes,"
Causing chaos between and betwixt.

BOOK REVIEWS

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

I have often said that we should not form a final judgment on men or institutions until we have heard the criticism; the defence; the critic's reply to the defence; and the defender's reply to that reply. Very often, however, circumstances do not permit a thorough investigation, in which case we may be compelled to form provisional judgments, based on such evidence as is available, evidence which we must select as carefully and fairly as we can.

Berneri's Workers in Stalin's Russia has the appearance of being reliable evidence on an important subject, not merely because of the author's own personal opinions, but even more because of the quotations the book contains—often from pro-Soviet writers. The conclusion to be drawn is a sad one. It is the old story once again. The workers have been let down by their leaders, and Russia is not, to-day, the workers' paradise which many hoped that it would become and some still believe it to be. For a time, in spite of the cruelties and excesses that accompanied the early days of the revolution, there was a promise of better things. When the Soviets were first formed they did provide some kind of channel for expressing the will of the people and promising social legislation was passed, especially in the interests of women and children. The tide of reaction, however, has now set in. The elaborate administrative machinery no longer functions to allow the will of the people to be expressed, but rather to transmit to the people the strict orders of the bureaucracy of the Communist Party, with Stalin, as Dictator, at the head. Political freedom is non-existent; police espionage is severe; the idolatry of "increased production" exploits and exhausts the poorer and less robust workers; the liberal legislation of the early days of the Revolution is being repealed or curtailed; militarism is rampant and was becoming so even before Russia became involved in war; and a new highly-privileged class of bureaucrats, technicians, and army officers has arisen to take the place of the old aristocracy.

These unwelcome developments do not justify any feelings of contempt for the Russian people or even angry and belligerent hysterics towards their leaders. They do, however, teach some useful lessons. Why do revolutions so often end in reaction and a return to something like the old regime under a new set of labels? Why are the workers so often let down by their leaders? The French Revolution began with the slogan: "Liberty, Fraternity, Equality!" It ended with the imperialism of Napoleon, and was, later, succeeded by the militarism and intense corruption of post-1918 French politics. The Russian Revolution seems to have gone the same way; why? The answer is partly to be found in the fact that revolutions are often accompanied by bloodshed and violence and upon methods of cruelty and violence, no matter how understandable, a curse for ever rests. Metaphorically speaking, it is the curse of God, for these methods are the antithesis of true Christianity and are in flat contradiction to the way of Jesus Christ.

It is, I am afraid, also necessary to realise that in our own and other countries the workers themselves have had a measure of responsibility for this betrayal. If so many of them had not been so politically uninterested and unintelligent; if in religious, ethical, moral and political spheres they had understood better "the things that belong to their peace"; if they had rallied more frequently, in larger numbers, and with greater determination in defence of some comrade persecuted by the State; if they had been less easily doped by propaganda; if they had shown better judgment in their choice of the men they allowed to lead them, and had rejected more firmly the unsuitable candidates pushed forward by corrupt or power-lusting groups or parties, these betrayals could not have come to pass. As things are, however, we must face reality and not try and linger in a fool's paradise. Russia has become a powerful "Fascist" country in a "Fascist" world: we have travelled far along the same road. The freedom of the workers is yet to be won, but if the right character and outlook can be gained, it is still attainable—in Britain, in Russia, and elsewhere. The job begins with the individual: what he is, and what he does. Where leaders and administrators are concerned, power always tends to corrupt: only true Christians and humble men endowed with the highest moral standards and destitute of personal ambition, can withstand the temptations of office. These are the men whom, alone, it is safe to choose or follow. The others will always let us down.

The following is an extract from Repair My House, a very thought-provoking pamphlet by the Rev. Charles Stimson of The Brotherhood of the Way, Haxone Abbey, Diss, Norfolk. Mr. Stimson for many years has been an able exponent of true Christian Communism, both by what he has said and written and by the sincere and wholly consecrated witness of his way of life. He feels that the true Church can give its most effective witness in these dark days through Christian communities whose members in all their personal and social relationships obey without reservation the principles enunciated in the Sermon on the Mount.

The command ("that we be reconciled to our brother before we proceed to our worship") would, if taken seriously, change our whole approach to life and religion. If we accepted this law as binding we should be compelled to think of the Church as a society existing to reconcile individuals, classes, and nations in its brotherly and equitable way of life. The notion of the Church as primarily a society for worship and mystical devotion, would have to give way to the thought of it as primarily a fellowship in Christ. We would no longer seek to draw men into a common worship and creed in the hope that eventually their divisions and rivalries might be broken down, but we would insist that the barriers be broken down, and reconciliation made, as a condition of membership. "First be reconciled . . . and then bring your gift to the altar," or again, "If thy brother sin against thee go and show him his fault . . . . If he will not hear the Church let him be as a heathen man and a publican." A society of this kind could, as it spread its bounds, save mankind; but a society which tolerates the class-war and international war, private quarrels and economic rivalries, among its members, and makes no attempt to thrash out the differences and to adjudicate between the parties, but seeks instead an abstract and fictitious unity on a level of worship and creed (divorced from the essential requirements of both worship and creed) could never save mankind though it enlarged its borders to cover the whole world. The question the Church should ask of the world is not, "Will you come to church and join in our worship and assent to our creed?" but "Will you come and be reconciled to your brethren within the divinely appointed sobriety? Will you worship God in a disciplined fellowship?"

OXFORD PEACE MEETING

On Armistice Day the Duke of Bedford addressed a meeting at Oxford, of an unofficial Oxford society for enlightenment on important matters, known as Group 26.

The Duke pointed out that the objectives which England had in mind when she declared war were now unattainable, and that the appeasement of Stalin was going to prove a bigger business than any appeasement of Hitler. He stressed the real nature of the conflict as an issue between Anglo-American orthodox finance based on gold, and Totalitarian unorthodox finance, based on work to be done and hands to do it. The Duke went no further than these limits, either in criticism of Anglo-America or in approval of the Axis.

In reply to questions from an Oxford teacher, whom the Duke amusingly mistook for a banker the Duke declared that the financiers of Wall Street and the City were men who knew perfectly well what they were doing, but were carried away by their lust for power, rather than simple-minded folk who precipitated storms and were then more or less dragged along in the wake of them.

After showing that—contrary to press misrepresentation—he had always been aware of certain virtues in Russian Communism and certain vices in German-Italian Fascism, the Duke outlined a more Christian world economy, which had the terrific merit of being obviously practicable.

At the end of the meeting the speaker was asked how the financiers could be dealt with, and he replied that enlightenment must proceed as to what sort of people they really were and what sort of thing they were really doing.

The Duke, who made a good impression, talked to an audience that was more Town than Gown. Academic Oxford still tends to cling to Churchill, Roosevelt, the gold standard, and other morbidities; but, perhaps that is a good sign; the University is a home of lost causes.

T. G.

The "Oxford Mail," in its issue for November 13, reported the Duke's meeting as follows:

The Duke of Bedford declared on Saturday, that in the event of a complete Allied victory and the unconditional surrender of the Axis Powers, Britain would be defeated morally in regard to her war aims.

"We shall have to agree," he declared, "to Russia taking more land than Hitler ever asked for.

"We went to war to save the rights of small people, but Latvia and Lithuania will be swallowed up by Russia."

He addressed a group who meet from time to time to hear diverse speakers and to consider varying problems at "The Greyhound," Oxford.

The group calls itself Group 26, because it was formed on the 26th of the month. It has a Committee which consists mainly of Oxford Playhouse actors and actresses. Mr. D. Davie-Distin presided.

"Many of you," said the Duke of Bedford, "may be hardly old enough to remember we promised Montenegro that she should regain her independence, but she was handed over to Serbia.

BRITISH WAR AIMS

"We went into this war because we refused to appease Hitler even when his demands in regard to Poland were not altogether unreasonable, but we shall have to appease Stalin.

"Do not think I am anti-Communist or anti-Russian in a vindictive fashion. When there was violent propaganda against Russia I stood for fair play for Russia.

"Russia has large gold mines, and Marshal Stalin is ready to exchange useless gold for useful goods. This may be nice for the financiers, but useless for people like you and me.

"At Bretton Woods it was proposed that the amount of foreign trade should be limited by the amount of gold they proposed to allocate to it—a sinister tyranny.

PEACE BY AGREEMENT

"There can be no lasting peace unless it be a peace by agreement, in which all nations bind themselves to respect the rights of others and to agree to co-operate to make use of the world's resources.

"When peace comes it will be in our interests to establish friendly understanding with the Russians."

RECONCILIATION

Bellshill Pulpit Message

On Sunday, November 12, 1944, the Rev. A. A. Bowyer preached at West Church, Bellshill, from the text:—

"God hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation" (2 Cor. 5, 8).

Part of his sermon was published in "The Bellshill Speaker," the following Friday. We make no apology for reproducing our contemporary's excellent report of Mr. Bowyer's powerful address:—

One of our wayside pulpit notices recently carried the following warning:

"If humanity will not end war, war will end humanity."

The events of these last six months have brought these words home to us in startling fashion. Science has placed such terrible power into the hands of man that it is a truth to-day that unless we can end wars, wars will surely end all that we know of civilisation. War has become so devilishly brutal with its ever increasing powers of destruction that another war will surely finish humanity. If we are ending this war with robots and rockets, if to-day cities can be wiped out by bombing planes and armies leave in their wake utter and complete devastation then with what fearful weapons will we begin the next war?

It is apparent that this war will end only on the "unconditional surrender" of Germany. It is time to ask whether this unfortunate slogan is not inevitably prolonging the war. "Unconditional surrender" quite obviously has come to mean for the German people extermination and utter and complete ruin. It offers them no hope at all. There are many people in Germany opposed to Nazism; if it were not so there would be no need for a Gestapo. What of the recent revolts and the opposition of the Church, Protestant and Catholic. "Unconditional surrender" brings even the enemies of Hitler to his side. He will rally them, as he is doing, on the plea that the Allies intend to wipe out Germany and to crush her for ever. The war might have been over to-day but for this foolish slogan. As it is Germany will fight to the bitter end, and the tragedy of it all is that the suffering and the sorrow in the world will continue to multiply.

Captain Liddell Hart, the military strategist, writing in the "Daily Mail," says this:

"Unconditional surrender has been a heavy handicap since its adoption. It is contrary to the most elementary principles of psychology and strategy."

Since it is the Church's task to end wars, not to prolong them, we firmly believe that "unconditional surrender" is contrary to the will and wisdom of Almighty God.

Assuming the end of hostilities, what are the plans devised to make future wars impossible? There is going to be an alliance of Great Powers—such as Britain, Russia, America, France and China. These military and economically powerful nations are to maintain the peace of the world. That this is a sincere attempt to solve the problem we do not doubt, yet we maintain that we are seeking peace along the wrong way.

History has shown that such Power alliances, so far from ending wars, create wars. After the Napoleonic wars a Four Power Alliance of Russia, Britain and Prussia (which being a victor in these days was said to be "peace-loving") was agreed upon to preserve the future peace of Europe. What happened? In 1821 Austria invaded Italy, and in 1823 France, admitted to the Alliance, declared war on Spain.

Is there any guarantee to-day that none of these five Great Powers will ever break the peace of Europe? It is not the small nations who are the aggressors, but the powerful. It is not Germany, alone, that breaks the peace. Russia first waged war in Europe when in 1938 she invaded Finland. And there is no guarantee that the Great Powers will not themselves be the first to break the peace. It has happened before, and it can happen again.

Is there a better way, a more stable way of creating peace? We believe so, and we are convinced that it is the Church's task to-day to declare this better way to the anxious and troubled peoples of the world. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, sayeth the Lord."

God hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation. The task of Christian people to-day is the task of reconciliation. God hath called us to proclaim two demands to the leaders of the nations and to the people.

The first demand is that of justice. Wars do not simply happen out of themselves. They arise out of injustice and a sense of grievance and hatred. The best way to end wars is to create justice. Let the Church, therefore, proclaim justice: justice not only for the big and powerful nations, but for small nations, for example, for Holland and Denmark and Poland, and for Germany and Japan also. If every nation were able to feel that she was receiving a measure of justice, if those nations that "have" were prepared to share their riches with those nations that "have not," then one of the real grievances that make for wars would be eliminated.

God, to-day, is pointing the nations of the world to the demands of justice.

The second demand of God is the demand of love.

"The law came by Moses," said the author of St. John's Gospel, "but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ."

The only thing to do with an enemy, if you want to live at peace is to make him your friend. There will only be peace in the world when the nations are friends one with another.

The great healing power required to-day is the power of love as it is exemplified in Jesus Christ. We must be prepared to forgive, to be merciful, to be generous even with Germany.

Her people must be shown that we do not want to exterminate them, but to live with them as brothers of the same Heavenly Father.

You say that this is folly, that it is impossible. Remember this, "that the Cross to some has always been a stumbling block, to others foolishness, but to them that believe the power of God unto salvation." There is no other way to peace, to an end of war, save the way of love and friendship laid down by Christ. Once, after the Boer War, Britain treated her enemy in a spirit of friendship and generosity. She confessed her common sin before God. To-day South Africa is one of Britain's most loyal friends.

The way of Christ works. Love never faileth. Justice is essential and vital, but greater than justice, more powerful for good is the way of love.

We must take that way. It is the Church's duty to proclaim it, and by that way out of the chaos and catastrophe of this present day we are persuaded that a new and better day will dawn—the day of liberty, of brotherhood, of peace.

Christ calls His followers on this Day of Remembrance to the ministry of reconciliation even as He through love reconciled sinful humanity to God.

The Editor of the "Speaker" in his "Bellshill Cavalcade" notes on another page, makes a challenging apology for reporting this sermon.

We reproduce our fellow-editor's commentary in full, side-headings included:—

THE REV. A. A. BOWYER.

I have printed the sermon preached by Mr. Bowyer to his congregation last Sunday. There has been a lot of talk and nasty remarks passed about it. Maybe that is why I have rushed it to press. Being a man with a dual personality, as it were, but only for commercial reasons, I will look at Mr. Bowyer's sermon from both angles.

A SOLDIER.

First of all I am a soldier (I was in the Home Guard once) and as a soldier I stand on the same platform as Mr. Winston Churchill and with him shout "Unconditional surrender" and receive the plaudits of the mob. Sure, make Germany pay for her deeds, and the only way to save ourselves from another war is to crush the spirit of the German people. They are not like the Polish or the Scottish people, who rose time and again when they were supposed to be crushed. The German nation is different; all it can do is take on the whole world and keep on fighting.

THE OTHER SIDE.

Then there is the other part of me, and it is good for Mr. Bowyer he has got me in a soft mood. "Vengeance is mine, I will repay," saith the Lord, and no nation has ever defied that statement and survived. Mark my words, just as sure as you are reading this paper this policy of "Unconditional surrender" which we are preaching to-day is going to have dreadful consequences. I agree with Mr. Bowyer; if there were no decent German people there would be no need for a Gestapo. We should take stock of what is happening behind the scenes in our own country to-day before we put ourselves in the place of rulers of righteousness.

AN AIRMAN'S LETTER.

I have just been reading a letter from an Airman prisoner of war. He was brought down when straffing some German aircraft gunners and put in hospital along with some Germans whom he had probably injured during the raid. The treatment he received was superb. His companion in the next bed was a young blonde German, who could speak English. He remarked to our young airman that his mother, who was coming to see him at the week-end, would be glad to meet him as she could speak English.

NO RAT POISON.

When the German mother did come her boy was dead, but the parcel she brought for her own son she left with our airman, and weekly parcels followed. The South of England clergyman will be shocked to hear that there was no rat poison in any of the parcels that German mother left. I make no personal comment on this. I merely pass it on to my readers.

The Editor of our contemporary is to be congratulated on his courageous and useful writing. Mr. Bowyer is to be esteemed for his fearless preaching. The combination of local press and pulpit makes Bellshill a healthier and more truly patriotic centre than it would be if the menacing and distasteful paganism of our war-epoch was permitted to parade its follies unchallenged.

Lanarkshire has another fearless and most scholarly preacher in the Rev. T. F. Harkness Graham, B.D.

On Saturday, November 18, 1944, the Hamilton Advertiser published the following pulpit announcement:—

CADZOW PARISH CHURCH.

11.15 a.m. and 6.30 p.m.—
Rev. T. F. HARKNESS GRAHAM, B.D.
Evening Subject—Thomas Muir, the Scottish Electoral Reform Martyr, with the Romance of a Bible.

VANSITTART PACIFISM

In the "Peace News," for October 20, 1944, John Middleton Murry wrote:—

. . . . one of the important facts to-day is that the German, who is in personal relations just as decent as the Englishman, is a quite different kind of political animal from the Englishman or the Frenchman. To assume that the Germans could create a workable democracy if only they were left to themselves is to assume what is probably untrue.

We are not concerned with the truth or error of this statement in itself. To our mind it is a definite plea for the military occupation of Germany. If Middleton Murry subscribes to this opinion, he ought not to be editor of "Peace News" and logically has no place in the peace movement. He ought never to have opposed the war.

Defending his attitude in the "Peace News" for November 4, Murry writes:—

On the whole I find pacifists rather ignorant of German political history. Vansittart knows the facts better than they do. It is a pity. Because, ignoring the facts, they cannot challenge his false interpretation of them. In an official capacity I had to make a close day-to-day study of German politics during the last war; and I am bound, in honesty, to say that the facts, as given by Vansittart in a recent broadcast debate (Listener, Oct. 19, p. 436) are, in my judgment, roughtly true. . . .

I differ greatly from Vansittart in the interpretation of them; but I believe he is right to warn us that liberalism, as we understand it, is an exotic growth in Germany. Unlike Vansittart, I hold there are good and sufficient historical reasons for this. Germany has had to cram into a century the growth of four centuries in Britain, and has had to depend on a powerful State to consolidate herself.

Moreover, since the Reformation her predominant religion (Lutheranism) has been precisely the one which inculcated complete submission to the State. Add to this the terrible sense of vulnerability that comes of a long exposed land frontier on the East, and you have all the conditions necessary to identify security in the German mind with the existence of a strong military State.

Just as liberals and pacifists in this country are loth to admit how much their development has been dependent on the security achieved by the British Navy, and regard liberalism and pacifism as the product of an immaculate conception, of immediate universal validity, so they are loth to admit that the peculiar conditioning of Germany is such that militarism and anti-liberalism are as natural to Germans as liberalism and navalism are to ourselves.

To admit this is not to fall into the Vansittart heresy of a peculiar and ineradicable racial evil in Germans. But it is to realise that the "education" or "re-education" of Germany is a necessity. To ignore that necessity is dangerous Utopianism.

The "re-education" of Germany is not a slogan of Pacifism. The man who believes in such "re-education" is playing at militarist politics and ought to give up pretending to be a pacifist intellectual. Murry has become a Vansittart Pacifist!

"DAILY WORKER" AGAIN

A Study in Falsehood and Misquotation

The "Daily Worker," London, in its issue for November 4, 1944, publishes the following enlightening item:—

ALLIED VICTORY "USELESS," SAYS DUKE OF BEDFORD.

From DOUGLAS HYDE.

With apparent indifference for the feelings of the wives and mothers of the men now dying in the final battles against Hitlerite Germany the pro-Fascist Duke of Bedford has just issued a leaflet telling them they die in vain.

The leaflet, entitled "Where Have We Got To?" goes farther in undermining the Allied war effort than anything yet published by this ducal apologist for Hitler.

In it he asserts that "any further sacrifice of life which the continuation of the war will entail will be, from every point of view, utterly and completely useless"—a comforting thought indeed for the men who are preparing for the biggest battles yet.

Here are other samples of the arguments used by this defeatist aristocrat:

"At the end of the war . . . . the principal victor will be the Atheist totalitarian Government of Soviet Russia, which in two Continents will be endowed with that absolute power . . . which corrupts absolutely";

"If there should be an Allied victory, the stage will be set for another war."

Did not the Communist Party between the years of 1919 and 1939 tell the workers that they die in vain? Did they not organise bogus Anti-Militarist Movements urging the workers never to fight again? Was not one of their present war-mongering stooges imprisoned for handing anti-militarist literature to the troops? Would these knaves have been anti-Hitler if Hitler had refrained from invading the Soviet Union? Is it not true that militarists in the capitalist saddle can send the nations to utter total disaster?

If ever there was an outrage committed against the freedom of the Press, if ever liberty was reduced to licence, the activity of the Communist Party has been that outrage and licence.

As to the Duke of Bedford's leaflet, the citations made are travesties of what he has written.

The Duke is a Christian and believes in God. We are Atheists. President Roosevelt and Premier Churchill are reputed to be Christians. Stalin is an Atheist. There are Christians and Atheists on the side of war. There are Christians and Atheists opposed to war. All parties unite, speak, and think in the terms of their peculiar philosophy and theology.

Answering the Christians who say that this is a Christian war, addressing himself as it were, to his nominal fellow-believers, the Duke says:—

We went into the war to check the spread of an un-Christian totalitarian political idea which subordinates the individual to the State. At the end of the war, if there be an Allied victory, the principal victor will be the atheist, totalitarian Government of Soviet Russia, which in two Continents will be endowed with that absolute power which, it has been said, corrupts absolutely. State tyranny, moreover, will have increased in most other parts of the world, our own country included.

We do not object to "Communist" apologists attacking the Duke of Bedford's views, but we do object to deliberate misquotation. It is a perfectly sound argument. Russia is an Atheist Totalitarian State not an Atheist Libertarian State. Because it is totalitarian, in the end it will surrender its Atheism. For Atheism means liberty—whereas dictatorship must have a cult, a church, and a worship.

After a perfectly friendly reference to Russia the leaflet utters a warning against the agencies that will tend to foster a war against the Soviet Union. It indicts British Imperialists who might want such a war and concludes with a plea for world total disarmament.

The leaflet merits wide reading. Only enemies of their fellows, in times of crisis, deliberately misrepresent what their opponents write. The Stalinists are merely the interested political liars of corrupt society and anti-social interests. They are the betrayers and enemies of Socialism and of mankind.

We shall return to the exposure of the "Communists" and shall list their crimes against the common peoples, until every decent man and woman of the working class will feel sick when the charlatan term "Communism" is mentioned. Just as the Church destroyed Christianity, so have the "Communists" depraved and mutilated Communism, the ideal of proletarian Socialism, the hope of oppressed mankind.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Comrade,—May you have many more 5th of November anniversaries, each nearer to your goal of international humanism.

The last two numbers of "The Word" have made the "anarchist" poseurs wriggle and they seem to be creating a red and black inquisition. Well the "heretic" label won't be strange to you.

Anyhow we know you will not pull your punches even though would-be anarchist champions can't take it. Your variety of sparring partners does not alarm us, for we know that they will not blunt your sane thinking, plain speaking, and militant action.—Yours in comradeship,

PETER AND MARY PAUL.

Hounslow, Middx., Nov. 5.

Dear Sir,—I have just read your book, "Call to Manhood." It is the best book I have ever read.

I am associated with the Birmingham Public Opinion Action Ass. recently formed in addition to the National Secular Society and R.P.A. Would you consider an invitation to address us—or lead a discussion—at the P.O.A.A.?

I was once your very near neighbour at Richmond Garden, Shepherd's Bush.

I was a C.O. during the last war on political grounds, of course. I know all about "padded cells." I have reached the age of 57, but I have just as much fight left as ever.—Yours fraternally,

T. H. BURGESS.

Birmingham, Nov. 6.

Dear Guy Aldred,—Many thanks for your prompt dispatch of "The Word" month by month.

And still the war drags on in spite of the increasing intensity of war weariness among the general public, and our struggle for the abolition of war must be maintained in spite of the increasing weariness of many pacifists who are beginning to suffer from the illusion that the end of the war will end our job. It will merely make it possible to make a real beginning of the task of putting an end to war for ever.—Yours in the struggle,

JOHN MORLEY.

Westerhope, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Nov. 5.

Dear Guy Aldred,—Many thanks for copy of "A Call to Manhood." What little I have read so far is very sound.

After hearing the Glasgow Anarchists speak in Brunswick Place, I must agree with the views you express. I must also confess that your remarks on the "Freedom Press" anarchists are quite justified.

A pity that human beings are so inconsistent!

Yours in the struggle,

D. J. MEAGER.

Nottingham.

Dear Sir,—Please forward copy of your book, "A Call to Manhood," by Guy Aldred.

I am a Christian Pacifist and as such find it a difficult job to gain tolerance and understanding from some of our fellow Christians.

Am a great admirer of Rhys Davies and the other M.P.'s in the Commons who refuse to countenance and support war or industrial conscription and totalitarian measures and decrees, 18b, etc.

Have been directed to coal mine from tribunal as a result of my objection.

With best wishes to you and for your journal. Keep it up. Live in faith.—Yours fraternally,

HERBERT LOVELL.

Sheffield.

Dear Comrade,—Congratulations on the fighting spirit unwaveringly shown by "The Word," and consistent general excellence of the articles and other matter which you secure.

I feel that I must say, however, that the articles about Herbert Read are a little ungenerous to one who has made a definite contribution to anarchist thought whatever our personal opinions of him as a man may be.

However, I find very little indeed to criticise in the paper and will close by saying, "More power to your elbow" and sincere good wishes from—Yours fraternally,

GEORGE J. EMMETT.

Hounslow, Middx.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have been going to write you ever since the splendid Negotiated Peace meeting you addressed here. I am more in accord with your views than with anyone else. I think the Duke of Bedford is a splendid and wise type. There must be many of similar views but we do not hear them from all sorts of reasons.

I am not bound by the shackles of so-called religion and the incubus of the next world by the fact I have never been a member of any Church, and my people were Unitarians.

I was born September 27th, 1871, so I am quite young in every way and hoping to see our point of view more widespread. What fearful folly war is. 1914-1918 convinced me, and this present war is just as silly. With best wishes for your great work.—Yours,

W. WOLSTENCROFT.

Lancaster.

CONSCRIPTION IN AUSTRALIA

A Study in Labor Politics

Readers of this factual study should regard this essay as an appendix to our "SOCIALISM AND PARLIAMENT," Parts I and II, obtainable from this office.—Editor.

The reader will understand this record of the menacing development of conscription with its trend toward servile statism, by noting the following biographical facts culled from Who's Who for 1944 :—

HUGHES, Rt. Hon. William Morris; P.C. 1916; C.H. 1941; K.C. 1919; M.P. for North Sydney in Federal Parliament of Australia; Leader of United Australia Party; b. In each case we have omitted publications, recreations, and addresses.

The biographical data retained show, how two men, one born in 1864, and the other in 1885, have risen from humble circumstance, through the Labour movement, to high position in the capitalist state, without in any way coming to grips with the social or economic problem, or saving from massacre and disaster the working-class whose contributions and sacrifices elevated them. Yet a generation—a full twenty years—separates their births. Parliamentarianism emancipated the leaders and left the workers submerged.

Compulsory military Service has been law in Australia and the Territories since 1903, when the first Defence Act was passed. It is established by Part IV of that Act. Section 49 forbids compulsory service outside Australia and the Territories.

In 1901, the Barton Government proposed that Australians should be compelled to serve outside Australia and the Territories. The proposal met with widespread opposition and the Government dropped the suggestion.

William Morris Hughes revived the idea in 1916 and in 1917. He challenged two Referendums on Conscription. The first was on October 28, 1916. Conscription for overseas service was defeated by 72,746 votes. On December 20, 1917, the "No" majority was 166,588.

William Morris Hughes walked out of the Labor Party in 1916 over the Conscription issue. He proposed to establish a National Government. The majority of the Laborists refused to follow him, but he made overtures to the heads of the Official Labor Party. He asked them to be represented in the National Government "so that the full force of the nation should be behind its war policy."

In this proposal, as in his overseas conscription referendums, Hughes had no idea of serving the working-class of Australia. He was moved by the glory of his parliamentary status, a sense of provincial imperial careerism.

Hughes had been in London. He had been feted. He had been admitted into the deliberations of the British War Council. He had sat at the Economic Conference. He felt his importance as a statesman and viewed, as inevitable, the servitude of the common people. In July 1916 he returned from England and in August 1916 decided that a Referendum would be taken on Conscription. He did not know that twenty-eight years later, to the very month, a later Laborist, John Curtin, would imitate him faithfully.

In 1916, John Curtin was not a Member of the House of Representatives. That was to come some years later. He had emerged from being secretary of the Timber Workers' Union and was about to become editor of the Westralian Worker, Perth, as a result of his opposition to Hughes. Curtin was on his way up.

When Hughes proposed to place his Conscription Referendum before the people of Australia in August 1916, Curtin, then a young man, became a leader of the "No" campaign in Victoria. He went to jail because he refused to obey Hughes' conscription law. He refused to become a conscript Hughesilier.

It was Curtin who wrote and issued the manifetso of the Australian Trades Union Anti-Conscription Congress, calling for a one-day stop work meeting on Wednesday, October 4, 1916. We reproduce the full manifesto in another column. As the reader will see from the text of this manifesto, Curtin wrote in 1916 :—

In the fight against conscription of labor and life, the Labor Movement finds itself also compelled to fight certain men whom it put into high offices to serve the Movement, and not to betray it.

No pledge against conscription could have been more emphatic than that.

In the days when we were resisting conscription, publishing The Spur, facing court-martials and enduring imprisonment for our military resistance, our Australian comrade, Don Cameron, became a regular and valued correspondent. Cameron reproduced our pledge against military service with approval. In time the correspondence lapsed. Don Cameron is now Senator Don Cameron, Australian Minister for Aircraft Production.

Our anti-war pledge was first published in "The Spur" during our struggle against war-time conscription. It was revised and published in "The Commune" (2nd Series, Vol. II, No. 3) for March, 1927. Don Cameron reproduced it, with acknowledgments in "The Tramway Record," Sydney, New South Wales, for March 19, 1927.

The pledge read :—

WORKER'S PLEDGE IN TIME OF WAR.

I REFUSE to kill any child's father.
I REFUSE to slay any mother's son.
I REFUSE to plunge the bayonet into the breast of any woman's brother, lover, or mate.
I REFUSE to murder, and deem the slaughter glory.
I REFUSE to butcher with the hands that were intended to serve and caress.
I REFUSE to soak the earth with blood and blind my reason with obedience.
I REFUSE to assassinate another man, and then hide my stained fists in the folds of a blood-stained flag.
I REFUSE to be flattered, cajoled, or driven into hell's nightmare by a class of well-fed snobs, crooks, and cowards, who despise my class socially, rob my class economically, and betray and oppress it politically. Let militarism do its worst, I refuse to serve, I decline to kill.—

This means that, as late as 1927, Don Cameron endorsed this pledge. Two years later we reproduced it as the concluding note of Chapter 9 of our "At Grips with War." The second edition of this book appeared in 1931, and the third edition is printing now. We have remained loyal to this pledge during two World Wars and decline to varyour firm anti-militarist attitude at this late date. Events establish its accuracy of vision and soundness of ethics. But Comrade Don Cameron, turned Senator, has grown into Australian Minister for Aircraft Production in the War Government of the ex-conchie, John Curtin!

In 1942, although Minister for Aircraft Production, Don Cameron opposed Curtin's overseas conscription proposals with vigour and ability. Two years later he supported Curtin's Federal Powers' campaign, although his Socialist studies should have told him that the purpose of these Federal Powers was post-war industrial conscription. Cameron had become a "Yes" man.

At a meeting of the Victoria Labor Party executive on December 4, 1942, Cameron recalled the speech made by Curtin in 1916.

Cameron declared that Curtin rose and said :—

I am a young man. I am single. I am eligible. I call upon the Labor movement to protect me, and men who are like me. I ask it to fight against conscription.

Curtin maintained his opposition to conscription as late as June 1939. He then opposed the Menzies Government National Registration Bill on the ground that it meant industrial and military conscription. As a result of his opposition, a provision was inserted in the National Registration Bill specifically declaring that industrial conscription should not be introduced into Australia.

This was Curtin's last stand. From now on, step by step, he forced the Australian Labor Movement, or, at least, its official caucus, to abandon its semi-anti-militarist position. The Australian defined "conscription" as overseas compulsion. Conscription for Home Defence and against invasion was deemed organisational only, so long as the pacifist was protected by a conscience clause and that clause was respected faithfully.

Overseas conscriptionists held that there was no difference between compelling men to resist an invasion with force and compelling them to become invaders. Hughes had to walk out of the Labor Movement in 1916 because he refused to make this distinction between killing in hot blood and killing in cold blood. John Curtin helped to form the No-Conscription Fellowship, organised a protest strike, went to prison, and helped to force Hughes out of the Labor Movement for urging overseas conscription. In October, 1916, he urged the Labor Movement to answer conscription for overseas service with a strike and a pledge of individual opposition. In November, 1942, as Labor's Prime Minister, he proposed that the Australian Defence Act be amended to permit the militia or conscript forces to be used anywhere in the South-West Pacific.

This proposal was unexpected. It created widespread surprise. The Labor movement learned of it with some consternation, but the representatives of capitalism and militarism rejoiced and Curtin was eulogised, his 1916 resistance to conscription having been forgotetn.

In The Worker, Sydney, H. Boote attacked the proposal and declared that conscription must be rejected. He avowed that Curtin's proposals were supported by "the same body-snatching reactionaries . . . who twice during the last war attempted to rivet the chains of conscription on Australia."

Boote continued :—

The Menzies and Fadden Governments pledged themselves not to introduce conscription during the present war for purposes outside our own domain.

The Labor platform explicitly repudiates the compulsory method of raising forces for external operations.

What right has anyone, or any group of men, to sweep away a principle which has become incorporated in the national policy of Australia?

Whatever present limit might be fixed for the employment of conscript forces, there would always be other places still farther on to which the enemy should be followed to protect our country.

First it is Timor, mentioned by Mr. Curtin. Then it will be islands in the vicinity. Then the Netherlands East Indies. Then Singapore, Malaya, China. Even the Mediterranean is essential to our welfare, and our fate, it would be said, is being decided in Africa and Europe.

Once assent to conscription for military service outside our own territores, and assigned limits are worthless.

The proposal submitted to the Labor Movement by Mr. Curtin will not do.

As we shall see, this feeble protest was Boote's last stand.

The Federal Conference of the Australian Labor Party met in Melbourne on January 4-5, 1943, and endorsed the Prime Minister (Curtin's) proposals to amend the Defence Act, so that the members of the Australian Militia Forces, as conscripts, could be sent outside boundaries of Australia's territories.

24 of the 36 delegates present supported the Prime Minister, and 12 were opposed—the 12 being from Victoria and Queensland respectively.

Among the 24 who supported the Prime Minister were 12, six representing New South Wales and Tasmania respectively, who had not been authorised by the affiliated organisations in their States to vote as they did.

In effect, they voted independently of the affiliated organisations to reverse the policy against military conscription for overseas which had been laid down by them over the years.

Despite the fact that he was Minister for Aircraft Production, Don Cameron, in The Labor Call for January 14, 1943, dealt faithfully with this conference and Curtin's conscription proposals in a powerful article written in the spirit of his pre-senatorial and pre-ministerial days. This was Don Cameron's last stand.

In July, 1944, Curtin returned from London exactly as Hughes returned from London in July 1916. He demonstrated the fact that Hughes was quite a pioneer just as Ramsay MacDonald demonstrated that John Burns was a pioneer. Emulation is unanswerable apology.

All the things that Hughes had done in 1916, Curtin had done in 1944. He had sat in the War Council. He had had the Freedom of London conferred on him at the Guildhall, just as Hughes had it conferred in 1916. He too had returned with a job to do. His first step was to secure the adoption of industrial conscription for the post-war period. The only way to do that was to ask the workers to vote "Yes" to a Federal Powers Referendum. Post-war reconstruction and the rehabilitation of returned ex-Service men and women was too heavy a responsibility to share between six States and the Commonwealth. Such was the camouflage. Prime Minister John Curtin added to his pledges on conscription. Despite his precious pledges on conscription, both industrial and military conscription were introduced by Curtin. He introduced industrial conscription by regulation and not by legislation. Actually, as he admitted afterwards, he wanted conscription of any and every sort in 1942 and 1943, for works and services, despite his assertions to the contrary. He was a worthy 1944 colleague of William Morris Hughes, whose Government had imprisoned him in 1916.

Up to the time he left London, Curtin had resisted all attempts to create a National Government in Australia. He clung to the War Council as an alibi, and on his return he found that Hughes, for all practical purposes, had been admitted into the Official Labour Party.

Never before in the history of the Official Labor Party had non-members of the Party been allowed to act on a Campaign Committee. On this occasion, invitations were extended both to the Communists and to Hughes.

Hughes was no different in 1944 to what he was in 1916. His opinions were the same. He was still a whole hog conscriptionist. It was not Hughes that changed his opinions. It was the Official Labor Party.

The Official Laborists, Curtin and his caucus, crossed over to join hands with the man whom for 28 years they regarded as a political Ishmael.

They acclaimed him.

The conscriptionists wanted Hughes to do as they did in 1916.

The Communists wanted Hughes because they were conscriptionists. Post-war industrial conscription was the major issue of the Referendum in August 19, 1944. But the Labor Movement of Australia voted No in 1944 for the same reason as it voted No in 1916 and 1917.

On Wednesday, August 16, 1944, Curtin issued the following appeal, beneath his picture :—

TO ALL AUSTRALIANS

"In view of the many misrepresentations that are being made, I reiterate my pledge to my fellow Australians, that neither I nor my Government will be a PARTY to INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION in Peace time.

"As your elected Leader, I ask you, in the interests of a better Australia in the post-war period, to Vote "YES."

JOHN CURTIN,
Prime Minister of Australia."

Three days later the workers of Australia voted "No." In New South Wales, 10 barometer seats, held by Labor, went over to "No" majorities. William Morris Hughes found his electorate of North Sydney against him with a "No" majority of 15,000 odd. The total "No" majority in New South Wales stood at 108,000. The equally strong Labor State of Queensland voted a strong "No" majority of 89,000. Curtin commented rightly that "the verdict is decisive." Like William Morris Hughes, he was disappointed.

"CORRUPTION, TREACHERY AND REACTION"

Curtin's 1916 Manifesto

[. . . . As pointed out in another column, John Curtin denounced the introduction of Conscription into Australia in 1916, when John Curtin was of military age. He called for a one-day strike on Wednesday, October 4, 1916, in a manifesto condemning the Government of William Morris Hughes as the "traitorous Government" which would betray "the Labour Movement," "wreck your unionism," and subject you to "servility" and "military slavery" by the introduction of Conscription. Curtin saw Conscription in 1916 as it affects the Conscript. In 1943 he conscripted the workers who elected him to resist Fascism and the introduction of Fascist methods. And in August, 1944, he sought powers of post-war dictatorship and industrial conscription. —Ed.]

Trade Unionists of Australia,—

Two specially convened and emphatically representative inter-State conferences of trades unionists have unanimously agreed that Labor's attitude to conscription is one of implacable hostility. For the workers that should be the last word on the subject.

In the fight against conscription of labour and life, the Labour movement finds itself also compelled to fight certain men whom it put into high places to serve the movement, and not to betray it. Unity of action is, therefore, now more essential than at any time in Australia's history.

If the Labour Movement loses, it means that Corruption, Treachery and Reaction win. Fight then you must for your life, your cause, your liberties.

Fighting gamely and greatly against conscription, the industrial movement has realised that the Proclamation of the Government summoning single men to the camps really establishes conscription, and believing the Proclamation to be illegal, as well as perilous—and for many other weighty reasons—your all-Australian Congress of trades unions has unanimously resolved that a protest must be made. Your congress has decided that the protest shall be made by means of stop-work meetings throughout Australia, on Wednesday, October 4, following the issue of the Government's Proclamation.

Whatever happens—whatever influences may be operated, whatever pressure may be brought to bear, whatever the consequences—attend the stop-work meeting on Wednesday, October 4th.

Your loyalty to the mandate of your chosen delegates will be a demonstration of the determination and power of the organised workers; and not only this, but an action certain to become historical as one of the world's finest displays of working-class solidarity. It may sound the death-knell of conscription.

At all events, it is Trades Unionism or Dictatorship in combat for the control of the lives and liberties of the people, and for the maintenance or annihilation of that "Government of, by and for the people" upon which the eminence of Australia has been based and builded.

On the Wednesday fixed upon, you will be expected to show that, under a strong provocation, willing a general holiday, you shall have it in the teeth of a lying press and a recreant Parliament. Not a cab, bus, tram or train should run, not a ship should sail, not a shop or factory or hotel or theatre should be open, not a newspaper should come out, not a butcher's, baker's or grocer's cart should be seen in the streets, not a man of the all-powerful working-class should be at work. Will you, as a unionist, help in the success of this policy? It is a policy for the protection and preservation of trades unionism, with all that it implies in better wages and conditions through a glorious gospel and might of organisation.

On the immortal Wednesday, mass meetings organised by the chief industrial body of each centre will be held all over Australia, and you will do your part nobly and well by attending such a meeting, and bringing along everybody you can. Spread the news!

At the same time, if you have reason to believe that any will be so vile as to scab on the stop-work call, make sure of effective picketing with your union's sanction. The times are too critical, and the issue too grave, to allow meanness or cowardice, or "standing in with the boss," to harass or handicap Australia's biggest achievement in industrialist action.

Success is vital. Singly, individually, the workers are weak—bound together they are strong. Without unity the workers will be crushed and beaten. United, their class solidarity will break a traitorous Government, astonish and hearten a continent, and save the situation.

In the meantime, those affected will wisely disobey the Government's illegal, undemocratic and tyrannical Proclamation. It must be resisted to the last ditch. Its success means your failure, whether you be married or whether you be single. The very making of the Proclamation is an attempt to sell your class and cause into servility. Do not be decoyed or deceived into thinking that, if married, you will save your own skin by sacrificing the single man. Introduced piecemeal, conscription, where coquetted with, has ultimately embraced all.

Therefore, stand together in defiant protest against an infamous and unconstitutional Proclamation intended to wreck your unionism, lessen your standard of subsistence, terrorise your hearth and home, and manacle you and your children. Refuse to be bullied or lied or voted into the slavery of military control, under which your progress—the admiration of a world—will be stayed, and your life made unendurable.

Already behind the scenes the foe is in high glee at the "split" he has successfully manoeuvred in the Labour Movement by breeding an insolent disregard for the mandate of the rank and file. For the rank and file it is now or never that it must justify itself—its rights and its duties.

Fellow workers, Trades Unionism is your trenches, emancipation is your flag, solidarity is your bayonet, and the stop-work meeting your machine gun.

Onward to victory! Stop work and vindicate your claims, and win respect for your demands. Thus, you march in a deathless army.

DO NOT BE HALF-HEARTED OR DOWN HEARTED.
LABOUR CONQUERS ALL.
For the National Executive,
J. CURTIN, Secretary.

THE FARMER AND HIS GUN

By Ben Quarmby.

In the Manchester Evening News for December 8th there appeared a special article by one John Bowra, devoted to the work of an 84-year-old Cheshire farmer, looking after his farm and swearing by the old methods, ploughing with the hand plough, and sowing from the hopper by hand, and holding a justifiable pride in the possession of implements that had belonged to his ancestors.

Illustrated with two photographs, the first of which shows the old farmer sowing seeds from the hopper in his field, with his collie dog "Flash" at heel, the second giving a close-up of the farmer with his gun, letterpress stating that the gun is the farmer's "most treasured possession."

It seemed peculiar to me that this conclusion could be reached by any writer after his hearing the farmer's praise for his old possessions, or by any farmer owning and taking pride in such, so much so that I suspected the hand of the warmad journalist, with the result that I wrote to the farmer as follows:—

Mr. Tom Chesters,
Smithy Bank Farm,
Burwardsley, Ches.

Dear Sir,—I have enjoyed and read with great interest the article on your activities in the "Manchester Evening News" of to-day's date, and wish you a happy and lengthy continuance of your healthy and useful occupation.

But surely the "News" reporter is wrong when he says "your most treasured possession" is a gun?

What would "Flash," the collie, think of this statement could he read? Surely you will inform me this is not correct, so that I can form a better estimate of your love of nature, of the soil, and the faithful followers and friends of man.

All the best wishes and seasonable greetings.

Yours very truly,
BEN QUARMBY.

In reply to this letter, I received the following from the farmer:—

Smithy Bank Farm,
Burwardsley, Chester,
Ches., 12/12/1944.

Dear Sir,—Now I take the pleasure in writing to thank you for your kind letter, and photographs which I received to-day, Tuesday.

"Yes," I quite agree with you when you state the matter about the Gun.

The photographs show that "MY MOST TREASURED POSSESSION" IS THE HOPPER.

Again I want to thank you for your kindness.

All Best Wishes and Seasonable Greetings.

Yours Very Truly,
(Signed) TOM CHESTERS.

This of course proves that I was right in my impression of the false ring of the article, and in my estimate of the farmer without having interviewed him, but of the impression given even by the illogical writing of the author of the article.

The article told us that old Tom's youthful ambitions were to possess a watch and a gun, but was a prevarication when it misled the reader into believing that the gun was still the most-treasured possession. Tom has learnt something since he was a youth, but our reporter still seems to be fonder of the gun, that of the pen, which is much mightier.

Wishing to see this false impression corrected in the paper in which the article had originally appeared, I wrote in the following terms to the Manchester Evening News:—

December 14, 1944.

Dear Sir,—I read with interest your article on 84 year old Tom Chesters, and his work on his 22 acre farm, in your issue of December 8, but in view of the two photographs and the man's love of the possessions of his ancestors, and of the mention of "Flash," his dog, I could not bring myself to believe the statement of your reporter, that the gun was this farmer's most treasured possession, with the result that I wrote to the farm, and have received a reply from Tom Chesters in which he says he agrees with me when I state the matter about the gun. The photographs show that "My most treasured possession is the Hopper."

I trust you will publish this as a correction to the erroneous impression created by your article.

Yours faithfully,
BEN QUARMBY.

Up to when I write this, on Christmas Day, the letter has not appeared in the News, although I expect a letter of correction to have some priority, and am aware of the limitations of space. Other letters have appeared on trivial matters, and I conclude it has been thought unimportant, and feel justified in seeking other means of publicity.

The simple inclusion of the words "near Chester" in relation to the whereabouts of the farm would have been useful information to many readers, not one of many I questioned knew where it was, neither did I until I received the reply letter from the farm.

Further clarity about the "hand plough" would also have been enlightening, as it was later stated that the farm boasted two horses. It is not clear whether these are used for ploughing or not, and an illustration of the plough would have been more in keeping with the nature of the article than that of a gun.

We have, however, been treated to a further article in the same paper by Bowra, this time the hardy annual of the lost property office sale of the transport department, and the usual cheap umbrella lots, a subject much less harmful than guns and more to the writer's taste than the construction of an informative logically developed article on a worth-while subject.

THE CHALLENGE of the PACIFIST SOCIALIST: AN ORIENTATION

By George W. Hartmann.

[George W. Hartmann is Professor of Educational Psychology at Teachers College, Columbia University. He was a foreign travelling post-doctoral fellow of the Social Science Research Council in 1930-1931 and the third President of the Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues (1939). Among his publications are "Gestalt Psychology" (1935) and "Educational Psychology" (1941). He has also served as Editor of "The Social Frontier" and the Yearbook on "Industrial Conflict." Dr. Hartmann is a member of the Board of Directors of "The Conscientious Objector," U.S.A., and the Executive Committee of the U.S.A. War Resisters League. He has written an excellent pamphlet, "Pacifism and its Opponents in the light of Value Theory."—Ed.]

The two great all-inclusive reforms that World Society of the Twentieth Century must undergo are easily identified. One is an attempt to meet the universal need for a standard of living possible in an advanced technological culture, i.e., Socialism. The other involves a change in personal behaviour and institutional practices on a large or small scale so that the violent "solution" of group difficulties is replaced by pacifist conduct. Stated in slogan form, the first is an effort to conquer or eliminate poverty, and the second an endeavour to banish war from human experience.

That involuntary poverty is an evil which men should jointly do all in their power to end is something few moderns deny. The character-building attributes of self-denial and simplicity of life are unquestionable; but we should never confuse the corrupting effects of luxurious consumption with the stark degradation of body and mind resulting from poor or insufficient food, insanitary and ugly housing, little or no education, etc. So long as half the human race lacks these decencies, Socialists are in no danger of demoralising men by showering them with the material abundance a planning and sharing economy could provide. Compulsory scarcity of goods and service yields so few satisfactions that we can count on the elemental drives and needs of people to energise their quest for the plenty that might be theirs if we properly organised our resources to that end.

A similar situation exists in the search for a warless world with this important difference: whereas most Americans see no point in economic deprivations and hardships as such, a much larger number than we like to believe declare that if war is the price that must be paid for a certain type of business prosperity, why then let's have war. I suspect that many industrial and labour leaders are now in a mood where they are ready to accept the prospect of more or less permanent and constant war as the most convenient means of keeping the economy going full blast. What if it does mean an annual casualty rate of a half million? In a country with the population of the United States, this loss can be easily balanced by the birth-rate. If some must die in order that others may continue to eat, and eat well—that's just an unfortunate reality, since one can't expect to get something for nothing.

This sketch emphasises what must already be clear, viz., that the popular acceptance of a Socialist outlook (broadly interpreted) is much further along than the acceptance of the pacifist view. Various factors contribute to this discrepancy; I am concerned here merely to note it and not to explain it, for it obviously contributes to the tension which occasionally manifests itself (1) between socialism and pacifism as "movements," and (2) between the two ideological loyalties in the same person.

As I see both the national and the world scenes, Socialism needs Pacifism to supplement it and make it a more attractive orderly whole; similarly, pacifism probably requires socialism to round out its implied program of community reconstruction. Oscar Ameringer used to say that Labour without the Socialist ideal was a corpse, but that the Socialist Party without Labour support was a spook. I wish I could say something apt about the other dyadic relation with which we are here concerned—the most appropriate figure that occurs to me is that of the wedded state. Socialism and Pacifism are like husband and wife—they need each other and self-realisation is impossible without the dependable presence and contribution of the other partner.

As in all pairings, we can distinguish between wife-dominated and husband-dominated families, i.e., between an individual who is a Socialist-Pacifist or a Pacifist-Socialist. Normally, the distinction is something only logic-choppers would worry about, but in a chronic crisis age like ours, the difference can be quite meaningful. I propose that we call a person who was originally a Socialist and then accepted the pacifist addendum a pacifist-socialist, and one in whom the order of development was reversed a socialist-pacifist. In mature and well-integrated personalities, the differences would be purely historical or genetic, there would be no true functional or operational distinctions in behaviour.

The failure of Socialists generally to absorb the pacifist position into themselves for the sake of their own completeness seems to me to be one explanation of the contemporary feebleness of international socialism as a conscious political force. I know of nothing which weakened the pre-1914 Social Democratic movement in Europe more than the fact that Socialists from all classes of society generally accepted non-pacifist or anti-pacifist directions in times of crisis. The spectacle of Socialists slaying each other merely because they were enrolled as soldiers in rival armies is too sickening to linger over. It is worse than nominal Christians murdering each other, because Socialism presumably was a newer and more vital creed. No amount of re-interpretation, analysis, and nationalisation about this war can make us feel comfortable when I think of a single member of the Socialist Party of the U.S.A. in uniform, a condition which means that that person stands ready to kill another human being on order of a "superior" officer. Even more repulsive is the butchery of the Russo-German front where millions have slain each other in the name of two rival forms of pseudo-socialism, which the unfortunate participants were unable to distinguish from the real atricle. Is it surprising if many potential converts, noting this incongruous tragedy, observe to themselves that in a pinch Socialists are really no better than and just as nationalistic as other folks? And since the behavorial gain is so small, what is the point in being a Socialist—even a democratic one—if it condones participation in wholesale slaughter?

The plain duty of the Socialist is to grow up, to learn from these painful lessons, and to accept the pacifist approach as an essential and indivisible part of himself. Conversely, the non-socialist pacifist wins integrity for himself when he incorporates the Socialist goal into his pattern of values. There are some pacifists—chiefly, but not always, of the narrowly religious variety—who deplore war and all its associated phenomena, but who seem blissfully ignorant of the political and economic conditions that foster international hostilities. Such pacifists will vote Republican in 1944, partly because of a genuine distaste for the blatantly militarist aspects of the Democratic Administration, but also because of the strong pull of "conservative" business practices. They fail to see man in his total cultural setting and the need to change more than one set of attitudes simultaneously if a balanced citiizen is to result.

Peace and Justice are co-ordinate values indissolubly linked together. The successful pursuit of one requires the simultaneous quest of the other. To speak of Peace or Justice is a false appraisal of the relationship. All efforts to correct injustices by war merely increase the inequalities of life. Yet it is also time that a peace that is not a Just Peace is recognised as being merely suspended or disguised warfare.

The roots of both Socialism and Pacifism are in such moral conceptions as fraternity and humanitarianism. To separate them is to divorce what both Nature and Man have decreed must be one if either are to live.

SOCIALISM IN LANARKSHIRE

W. E. CURRIE

25 YEARS' WORK FOR SOCIALISM.

Mr. W. E. Currie Honoured.

Members of the United Socialist Movement in Lanarkshire held a social and dance in the Y.M. Institute, Motherwell, on Friday evening, December 22, 1944.

Mr. C. Foley presided over a large and representative gathering which included members of Labour and Socialist organisations in the county.

After tea reference was made by the Chairman to the excellent progress made by the Socialist Movement in Lanarkshire. At last it was being recognised that no matter to what organisation or party members were attached, they must go forward as one united body if Socialism was to be achieved. One of their number who had been largely responsible for establishing this unity was Mr. W. E. Currie, whose record of service to the Socialist Movement over a quarter of a century was well known. It was to recognise that service that a testimonial had been raised some time ago. To-night he had much pleasure in calling on Mr. Blaeford to make the presentation.

WALLET OF NOTES.

Mr. Blaeford, in asking Mr. Currie to accept a wallet of notes as a token of their appreciation, referred to the splendid service rendered by Mr. Currie, particularly in the interests of ex-servicemen.

Mr. Guy Aldred, Glasgow, said he was glad to be present that evening to pay tribute to a great Socialist friend and comrade. He spoke highly of the work performed by Mr. Currie over a long period of years.

Tributes were also paid by Mr. Robert Weir and other members of the Labour and Socialist movement.

Mr. J. Carracher, Hamilton, and Mr. L. Fisher, Burnbank, also spoke highly of the service rendered by Mr. Currie, while letters of appreciation were received from Members of Parliament.

EXPRESSION OF SOLIDARITY.

Mr. Currie, in thanking all concerned for the honour which had been bestowed on him, said that he felt that this was not only a personal tribute but an expression of the solidarity and comradeship which existed among them.

The dance which followed proved an outstanding success, the duties of M.C. being ably carried out by Mr. C. Foley. Songs were rendered by Mrs. Freel and Mr. J. Ewart, while Miss Betty Boyd earned much applause by her delightful elocution.

Mr. Bob Carroll provided the accompaniments with his usual efficiency and skill.

—"Motherwell Times," Friday, December 29, 1944.

A record of Comrade Currie's Socialist activity was published in these columns for June, 1944. His more recent work and challenges on behalf of serving soldiers, ex-servicemen from the last war, and conscientious objectors will be reviewed and recorded in an early issue.

NOTES AND COMMENTS
BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

"The Britisher will always fight and die, if need be, for the freedom of some other nation, but rarely for his own freedom and security. We are, in fact, more famous for our love of fair play than our ability to see beyond the end of our own noses." In the above passage, Mr. R. Scrutton has, as American slang puts it, "said a mouthful." Indeed, how much happier the world would be if the people of all nations could learn the simple lesson that it is better to mind your own business and put your own house in order than meddle in other people's affairs; also, that it avails little to display the courage of a lion in resisting alien tyrants on behalf, it may be, of an alien land, if, in relation to your own tyrants, you display the qualities of a sheep and rabbit combined.

In the report of the Liberator (Monetary and Foreign Trade Reform) Council it is stated that "the Government have bowed before the storm and, under pressure of M.P.'s of all parties, have postponed indefinitely discussion of the Bretton Woods Plan (Final Act). It is thought, by informed circles, that this means that the Plan is dead, but the Liberator Council have decided to continue their campaign until an official pronouncement is made." If the Plan, which has as its object the economic enslavement of the world by a gang of Wall Street financiers, is dead, it constitutes a very striking victory for the advocates of a sane order in foreign trade and money-creation.

The notes published by the Negotiated Peace Campaign point out that in Germany in almost every election from 1871 to 1912 there was a steady decline in the votes polled for the militarist and imperialist "Right" parties, and that even under the Nazi régime over 25 per cent. of the votes cast at every election have been Labour, in spite of a discouragement of opposition parties severe, though not, as in Russia, absolute.

On December 12th Mr. Morrison reported in the House of Commons that food and medical supplies are being sent to the Channel Islands and that "the German Government have granted a safe conduct to the ship which will convey these supplies to the Islands." So much for the yarn that we cannot negotiate with the Nazis because they cannot be trusted and that no agreement on the question of the restriction of bombing could have been reached when Germany offered to discontinue the use of V1 if we would abandon our wholesale bombing of non-military objectives in Germany.

Farmers have asked for German prisoner-of-war labour. This will never do. What use is it for the British and American Military Headquarters to issue fierce and foolish orders against fraternisation lest the troops should find out that the Germans are ordinary human beings, if the same discovery is to be made by our agricultural population at home? It is, however, reported that some Land Girls threaten to go on strike if they are asked to work alongside German prisoners. Cannot these Miss Vansittarts be sent on a lecture tour to those districts where British girls are proving a bit too friendly with Italian prisoners?

Nominal Socialists have done many disgraceful things in this war contrary to the principles of true Socialism and Christianity. The imprisonment in concentration camps, under harsh conditions, of conscientious objectors, by New Zealand ex-pacifist Labour Ministers, should cause the latters' names to stink in the nostrils of decent men for all time—unless, of course, the offenders should achieve a very genuine repentance.

"A war-devastated country with a population of millions of miserable and illiterate people swept up in all sorts of major and minor wars, petty quarrels and disputes, and massacred, pillaged and ravaged by local and national tyrants for more than twenty years. For this length of time armed bands, some large enough to be called armies, were roaming about the land of China, extorting taxes and tribute from the people wherever they went, massacring and robbing wherever they found resistance, and fighting with one another for local supremacy. Their armies were equipped with European weapons and their representatives and officers came to Europe to visit its great armament firms—Creusot, Vickers, Krupps—and to place orders for the latest type of weapons."

The above passage is an extract from Fenner Brockway's "Death Pays a Dividend," an up-to-date exposure of the international armament racket which everyone should read. It shows that, badly as the Japanese have often behaved on the Continent of Asia, they have treated the Chinese little, if at all, worse, than the latter have treated one another. Nor has the conduct of the white races in the Far East been anything to write home about. Which is likely to do more good to the peoples of Asia and to the world in general—years more fighting to enable the white races to recover their more or less ill-gotten gains and deprive the Japanese of theirs, or an effort to secure peace on terms which will impose on both belligerents the duty of showing greater regard for the interests of native peoples and a willingness to develop and share economic resources for the benefit of all?

Mr. Churchill has now made it finally clear that Poland—the country for which we went to war—is to be sacrificed and our pledges to her are to be broken in order to appease the Soviet Government. This seems to be causing very strong feeling in America, and some feeling even in our own country. The Manchester Guardian, after many years of untrammelled warmongering, during which it has been disloyal to those principles of true Liberalism which in its early days gained it a high reputation, now complains, "This is not a Polish crisis; it is a crisis of the United Nations." Well, what else could it expect than a crisis of such a kind in such a war unreasonably prolonged?

Meanwhile reports regarding the state of Eastern Europe, all pointing to the same conclusion, and none needing to be taken from Fascist sources, come in thick and fast. The Co-ordinating Committee of American Polish Associations protested against the refusal of the Soviet Government to permit Unrra to enter the liberated portions of Poland for relief work and suggests, very reasonably, that unless the Soviet Government changes its attitude, it should be requested to withdraw from the Unrra Council and renounce its claim to American aid.

The Catholic Herald reports mass deportations into Russia of Lithuanian citizens and the murder of Bishop Motulionis, a church leader of great devotion and courage. Also, the murder of Dean Vladas Mironas and the passing of death sentences on relatives of Antonas Garmis, chairman of the Lithuanian Red Cross, who had condemned Soviet terror methods. A relative of an English friend of the writer's, living in Sweden, reports the arrival of large numbers of refugees from the Baltic States fleeing from the Soviet "liberation" and the fate which appears already to have overtaken many of their fellow-countrymen.

Further details of the vindictive terms imposed on Finland include a demand for the handing over of "war criminals" to the mock justice of a Russian tribunal. It is high time to face facts. The Soviet Government is as ruthless in its foreign and domestic policy as the German Government, and may even in some cases be worse. "Unconditional surrender" is only another name for unlimited idiocy. The right course for the Democracies is to hold the balance between the rival tyrannies, and compel both, as the price of peace, to observe the decencies of civilised behaviour, not forgetting to do the same themselves. Certainly Russia has a right to protection from military attack, but so also have the Baltic States and Poland, and so also has Germany, and this protection cannot be found in the annexation of the territory of neighbour states, but only in total world disarmament. The rulers of the Democracies are well aware, and now sometimes even admit, that the world of tyranny, violence and injustice that is the best that unconditional surrender can now achieve contains little or no hope of lasting peace. If they lack the vision and courage to try the alternative, then the peoples they are supposed to represent should make them, before further lives are wasted in a struggle that lacks both sense and hope more obviously as each week goes by.

I cannot help feeling that many pacifists hardly realise the strength of their own position and, by being too diffident and pessimistic, are not as effective as they might be.

In March, 1944, I attempted a vigorous and fairly comprehensive challenge to the more extreme militarist position in the pamphlet "Straight Speaking," which many readers of The Word will have seen. The pamphlet has had a wide circulation and I myself have sent it to dozens of pro-war people, including all the most rabid I could find. In some cases I have issued a very definite challenge to my contacts to send a reasoned and weighty answer, if they could. With one solitary exception, not a single individual has shown himself, or herself, prepared to stand up to "Straight Speaking" in fair argument. The exception just referred to—a professor—sent a reply which even the most impartial judge could hardly consider "weighty," as it consisted largely of personal criticism—and he declined to face a second round!

Surely, if we have a case, growing stronger every month, which we can present to our opponents with the confident challenge "You may meet this with abuse, but you cannot by fair argument and I don't suppose you will even try!" we can take our stand with more assurance?

HEAVY-FOOTED WOMAN.

Heavy-footed woman,
Mother of seven.
At this time of the year
She lies down on her bed of straw
To gift to the world
Another child.
Baggy-eyed woman,
Washing clothes in a box of a kitchen,
Five stairs up in a slum,
Asthmatic, and gasping,
For the steam in the kitchen
Envelopes her like a mist.
Three children asking for bread,
But they'll have to go hungry
Till father comes home with his dole.
Weary-hearted woman,
Just one of a million,
Just one of a million,
Yet, perhaps, in her womb
A child that will live for ever,
A genius that will reshape
The beauty of the world,
And link his name with the stars.

"A CALL TO MANHOOD."

The Christian Pacifist reviewed this work in its issue for December, 1944. The reviewer wrote:

Dr. Aldred is never dull, and these essays, most of them editorials reprinted from "The Word," though not all of equal interest now, have a literary quality and a penetrating judgment that justify their preservation in book form. Some of them written during the last war afford material for an interesting comparison with the present time. We particularly commend "Christianity, Militarism and Espionage," which is a study of 1888, and "The Vansittarts Dined with Hitler," which quotes Mr. Ward Price's description of Sir Robert and Lady Vansittart's fraternisation with Nazi leaders in 1935. Prospective members of the "win the Peace" movement should have a look at this first!

In another column, our contemporary notices the Duke of Bedford's pamphlet on finance:

"The Financiers' Little Game" (Strickland Press, 18 pp. 2d.) is a piece of forceful writing by the Duke of Bedford exposing the abuses of the money market.

The Call, New York, in its issue for December 1, lists A Call to Manhood in its Vital Pamphlets for Socialist study.

OUR LETTER-BOX

FROM NEW ZEALAND.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—It is almost a year since I wrote to you. The "Word" has been arriving regularly, much to my amazement, as I have heard of it being withheld from someone here.

I am enclosing a five-shilling postal note in this envelope, and am forwarding another five-shilling note in another letter. Please send me Eastmann's "Marxism," your own work, "Communism," and anything else you think there is a chance of my receiving. I leave the whole matter to your discretion. Take a percentage for your deficit fund if you think fit.

Sincerely yours,

J. K. ALEXANDER.

Dunedin, N.Z., 11-10-44.

Dear Guy Aldred,—Your letter of August 12 arrived on Wednesday last (October 4), and I want to thank you very much for all you are doing to feature the stand that Sydney has taken.

I am hoping that the September "Word" will not be intercepted by the Censor here and virtually banned. Not long ago a boy in Dunedin sent you an airgraph asking for the "Word" to be posted to him and arranging for the subscription, and a week later his letter was returned by Censor saying that "ALL GUY ALDRED'S PUBLICATIONS" were banned in this country!

I received the August issue yesterday. When Sydney was in gaol near Christchurch, he was allowed to receive the "Word," so I am going to try again, now that he is back in Hantu prison. You may have heard that he, and the five other men who were in solitary confinement for refusing to co-operate with the detention system, were taken before the magistrate quite suddenly and all given "prison for the duration." Lincoln Efford regards it as a strategic triumph for the men, and I certainly think that the pressure we brought to bear must have had some effect this time.

It is tremendously heartening to know that all over the world there are individuals determined to speak the truth as they see it. And how this mad, sad world, is in need of such! But it will need more than a handful of such people to work as leaven through "the dull, dense void" if World War III is to be averted. The future prospects are pretty well hopeless at the moment.

Yours sincerely,

MONICA TOWNEND.

Christchurch, N.Z., October 8, 1944.

Hantu Prison, Private Bay,
National Park, 29/10/1944.

Dear Guy Aldred,—Once a fortnight we are permitted to write one letter to a friend and as yesterday I received from my wife, together with a bundle of other literature, copies of the "Word" for August and September, I wish to use this precious letter immediately to say how much I appreciate all you have done, and I know will continue to do, to serve the cause we have mutually at heart. Needless to say, I got a surprise in looking through the latter issue of your monthly, and can but thank you again and trust that the revelation of such matter will help to stir up a few more people to action. I would like to say here, that in all my protests against the action taken against me in this country, I have endeavoured, as far as possible, to stick to principles and have not attempted to use any qualifications I might have as a lever to gain special consideration.

At times, in moments of depression, some of us fellows get a feeling that we are bumping our heads against a stone wall, and often wonder whether our minute efforts are making any impression either on the Government or on the public in general—the opposing forces having at present such terrific power and in control of practically every vehicle of expression that touches any appreciable section of the public. Despite such apparent futility of our stand, however, we do know, at heart, that such a course of action is absolutely necessary if this decadent age is ever going to pull itself out of the mire in which it flounders; if a recession to the Dark Ages is to be avoided. You can understand what wonderful encouragement it is for us to know of the excellent work that is being done by you, and men like the Duke of Bedford and Rhys Davies, M.P. I assure you that you have the very sincere wishes in your future work of many people out here.

The steps taken by the Newcastle War Resisters Group, as announced in your July issue, is excellent, and gives weight to the few who are trying to stimulate such action by the corresponding Union in this country. After the present holocaust is over (and how we long for that day), I foresee a huge task confronting us, and I hope that progressive-minded people will be able to sink their minor differences and pull together in order that there never will be a repetition of the conditions pervading in 1939. That in such collaboration wooliness of thought and action can be avoided is testified by the brilliant joint work of yourself and the Duke of Bedford.

I am also impressed with the contacts you are establishing with like-minded people overseas—such voluntary collaboration is the only real approach which can be made towards the development of the international spirit. What a valuable increment of association can be so gained for those who work in the respective countries!

This place is classed as a prison farm and the conditions here are far more congenial than in the more solidly established institutions such as one of my previous residences. At the end of my last three months' sentence, on July 4 (Independence Day), I was returned to the detention camp and kept there for nine weeks, after which period I was re-sentenced to prison for the duration of my detention. The conditions here seem very pleasant, indeed, after those nine weeks, and are almost like freedom itself. What effect the real product will have it is hard to imagine.

The countryside here is very beautiful at this time of the year with all nature bursting with life; it is truly a time to renew one's faith in humanity.

With every good wish, and trusting that you enjoy the best of health as I certainly do.

Yours sincerely,

SIDNEY TOWNEND.

AUSTRALIA NO-CONSCRIPTION CAMPAIGN.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—A copy of "The Word" (January, 1944, Vol. 5, No. 6) has been handed to me by a friend, so I thought I would write to you. Under separate cover I am sending you a collection of Australian papers which will acquaint you with all the activities of the movement here. I hope you will help us in our work. We are members of the No-Conscription Campaign, and meet each Sunday night in the Temperance Hall, Melbourne. The meetings are public and the lectures of topical interest. Your journal seems to have readers in this city, and they would be most welcome at our meetings. The N.C.C. came into being over 12 months ago, when the Prime Minister, John Curtin, amended the Defence Act, to compel men and women, I suppose, to fight outside Australia. Mr. Blackburn, our late President, was the only member of Parliament to oppose the Bill. Some members of the Labour Party were ready to support him, but were bound down by the Party. Many, maybe most, Trade Union leaders supported Curtin, and also the Communist Party.

At the last Federal Elections, Maurice Blackburn stood as an Independent Labour candidate, and was defeated on the preferences. Workers were led to support Curtin and the Labour Party through this rally in support of the trade union bureaucracy and the Communist Party. Blackburn had been excluded previously from the Labour Party because he dared to speak for the Anglo-Soviet Friendship League. But he acted from principle and was not prepared to support conscription just because "Communists" wanted it.

Comrade Blackburn is dead, but we carry on his good work. We opposed the recent Referendum, which the majority of the Australian people rejected, because we felt that, since the Amended Defence Act was military conscription, the Referendum was industrial conscription.

My friend drew my attention to the title of Rhys Davies' Cosmo address: "Has Conscription Come to Stay?" I am quite sure that we are doing effective work towards answering this question with a definite "No."

Those opposed to our activity and stand tell us that our case is hopeless: "Conscription has come to stay." Our reply is the challenge: "Has It? You wait and see. The Australian people have never supported conscription."

We proved our case in the recent Referendum. The people gave their answer.

I am glad to note your strong opposition to Conscription. We are often told that Australia is the only country that has not been conscripted. U.S.A., Britain, Canada and New Zealand are held up as examples. It is good to receive reports of resistance.

We are told that this is a war against Fascism. Let the "democratic" leaders (sic) produce some proof of this fact, by not developing a corporate State inside their democracies. Let them not foist Fascism on the workers inside Australia.

I am a student here of the Melbourne Labour College.

It may be of interest to you to know that my grandfather, Robert McNeil, saw the light of day on the shores of Bonnie Scotland.

Best wishes and kind regards in the great struggle.

Yours fraternally,

JEAN ALMOND.

Melbourne, Vic, Australia, October 31, 1944.

Dear Guy,—"The Word" arrives fairly regularly. It is difficult to send any financial assistance from this part of the world under present regulations, but I will make further enquiries. I want to help.

It is a splendid thing that Humanist Society of Friends: I trust the time will arrive when it will be officially represented here. It will do more good than all the talk about Union or Re-Union of the Churches. It is good to see Bottomly's name mentioned.

Yours,

A. E. COSTAR.

Melbourne, Victoria, Australia, 6-11-44.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I held off writing until I could report receipt of the six packages you sent. Four were received soon after receipt of the letter and a fifth some days later. That doesn't seem a bad average, but since each package contained different booklets, imagination rather magnifies the loss of the sixth package. I have read only a few of the things sent but, frankly, some of these nearly knocked me out. I am referring especially to the concluding article on Read in The Word.

Socialism to me has rather a respectable connotation (though I know little enough about it) but Anarchy in my mind is the essence of selfish lawlessness; terrorism; and to find them used synonymously sent me reeling.

"To hell with culture." I was aghast! Either I am addle-brained or Read is.

"Suicide is more dishonourable than murder," says he. It is more honourable to injure others than one's self? Funny code! A ghastly code. No wonder we have wars. And this man's selfish ravings are touted as exemplary?

I am so happy not to find these corroding sentiments in the little booklets by the Duke. He really is rare. It amazes one to find so much active nobility and high-mindedness in this sordid world. I haven't read all of them but I should like to have more of those I have read so far, especially "Straight Speaking" which, like Mr. Cornell, I find chock-full of information and logic. Oh, I forgot doesn't Semantics claim logic to be illogical?

I have one up on you. I was in your country way back in 1909. Arrived on the Allen Line, Ionian, I think. That was the Golden Age. Or did it only seem "Golden" to me?

I was just young enough to be enchanted by everything. I wasn't lifting any corners. Come to think of it I don't believe the "Golden Age" part was all fantasy at that. No class hatred; no race hatred. Then the "Four Freedoms" were so much a part of our lives that like breathing, we were unconscious of them. That was before nations, for their own ends, destroyed the character of other nations, before the hate-mills of the first World War started their baleful grinding.

How different were things when I was again in Europe in 1921. But you must know about the misery then. You have had plenty good writers who covered that period. You British have been more fortunate than we in that respect.

Do you know it was impossible to get a copy of "Unfinished Victory" here even in '39 and '40? A friend finally got a few copies from Canada but the source soon dried up. That also was his experience (and he is a book merchant) with other British books. Ponsonby's "Falsehood" is still to be had, I believe, but not locally.

Sincerely,

ELSA GRUBBS.

Cincinnati, Ohio, U.S.A., Nov. 24, 1944.

Dear Guy,—This morning when I asked for details about your Sunday meeting, I was piqued that I had been unable to attend, owing to a very bad cold I could not throw off. According to my comrades who were there, you gave one of the very best lectures they had heard.

I often wonder how you manage to struggle on rendering the service you do, not only on the platform and in the press, but privately, with your encouragement, assistance and advice. I am sure that, whether they express it or not, the people you help appreciate what you do. The world owes you a lot of harmony, happiness, and rest, and it is bad for you to take things too hard. But harmony seems impossible in the topsy-turvy chaotic world in which we live, and you probably would find no happiness in easing down the struggle. Still, you need rest.

I think that the December issue of "The Word" is extra good. I was pleased to see "Gowrie's" report of the N.C.L. meeting. Your address made good reading and I liked Comrade Rhys Davies' rebuke to his own party and to the snug, conceited, self-righteous Britishers who support the notion that their mission is to educate the German people. I am glad to see that you lend encouragement and support to the live-wire Socialist Welshman by giving his anti-war stand as much publicity as you can. I hope that Comrade Davies and yourself can keep the struggle up. Perhaps both of you can give the Labour and Communist militants a red face. I doubt it, for they are too much possessed by the opportunist careerism of power politics.

The speech delivered by Francis, Duke of Bedford, against the Seditious Meetings Bill, was marked with sincerity towards the working-class. I was enamoured with its clear and unambiguous language.

The same characteristics mark the present Duke's new feature, "Notes and Comments." They are pertinent and humorous.

Your reply to the American Anarchist editor, Frank, is dignified and powerful. It will give him a little study before he replies—if he ever does.

Best wishes. I hope that next year's first issue of "The Word" will be as good as the December, 1944, number.

Fraternally,

HUGH LAMBERT.

Paisley, December 6, 1944.

Dear "Richard Carlile the Second,"—Congratulations on December issue of "The Word." If only ALL the people of Britain could read it, instead of the rubbish they are spoon-fed with—by Press, Radio, Cinema, Church, and Professional office seekers.

I note a contributor to the "Letter Box"—Arthur French—thinks you are an Anarchist.

I wonder whether he can give us his definition of an Anarchist, and then perhaps you will tell him what an Anarchist is.

I do not think there has been any word in our vocabulary that has been so distorted and misrepresented as this word has, very few persons really know.

It reminds us of the interpretation put on the word Bolshevist—which also few people knew the meaning of when it was used first in this country.

When I look back over the years since Shepherds Bush, I realise that no man has fought so hard against our rotten system as you have, hence my addressing you as above.

I do, however, feel that the future will produce some more who will carry on the struggle.

Sincerely

FRANK BURGESS.

Birmingham, Dec. 17, 1944.

Dear Aldred,—I, as much as the Duke of Bedford, cannot make out why you are an Atheist, even though I have read your books with care and followed your evolution with more than sympathy. To deny God appears to me just to deny free will, which seems most fantastic in a man such as yourself, who daily makes such good use of his will. I think that suffering just unhinges you a little there, and no wonder: for suffering, in this world, can be so appalling. I have, in the past, gone through what you have, but I am a deist, or rather, I should say, a mystic.

All the same, if Bedford is puzzled that you are an Atheist, I am just as puzzled that he is a Christian.

Kropotkin was a great inspiration of my youth. No one more than myself deplored the attitude he adopted in his old age. It was a terrific blow to me. Yet I think that we are rather too severe towards Kropotkin. I may be wrong, but I, personally, think he regretted his foolishness, and died of a broken heart. It is no excuse, no doubt, but after all, none of us are infallible; and, integrity, so valued by us both, so clear to us in our own case, is a matter not easy to guage in complete fairness in other people. Could we do that we would know more of that mystical animal called MAN!

I have read Berneri's Workers in Stalin's Russia, a useful little book because it is not expensive and presents many facts in a nutshell, though it is in parts inadequate and somewhat crude. For instance, in the chapter on women, the author seems to represent the acme of woman's rights over her own body as the right to abortion. The Soviet's coarse policy is not only that it failed to guarantee this right to abortion for very long, but far more that it never had enough imagination to see further than abortion, and never upheld birth control. This Margaret Sanger shows in her autobiography. Still, the book is not bad.

I will not say that I send best wishes for a happy New Year—it will hardly be so—but certainly for a happy continuation of your good work. And let us hope that 1945 will bring us peace—for what it may be worth.

In the struggle, fraternally,

F. LAFITTE-CYON.

THE HUMANIST TRADITION.

There was glory in ancient Greece
Where Socrates and Epicurus
Gave imprisoned truth release,
And man, new aims and aspirations.

There was grandeur in old Rome—
Aurelius, Cicero, Lucretius—
Towered like St. Peter's
Over all the mental landscape.

In the era of rebirth
There were Leonardo, Valla,
Testifying to the worth
Of the man-centred mind and spirit.

The Enlightenment brought Voltaire,
And the great Encyclopaedists—
Diderot, and D'Alembert—
Then came Hume, and Mill, and Darwin.

Our own land had Franklin, Paine,
Jefferson, and Ingersoll—
Men of free, creative brain,
Crowning Humanist tradition.

VANSITTART'S APPEAL.

I have just received an appeal on behalf of an Orphanage, signed by Lord Vansittart. On Thursday, March 26, 1942, Lord Vansittart criticised my parody, "Onward Conscript Soldiers" published in "The Word," saying that it was "a piece of grubby doggerel, that any third form boy would disown." He asked for my suppression on the ground that the poem was an evidence that I had "never grown up!"

Philanthropist, you did not like my verse
On an Archbishop who supported war.
I now return the compliment. I find
Your sense of humour lamentably poor.

—BEDFORD.

Intellectual Irresponsibles

Our articles on the subject of "Anarchism and Integrity" have led to wide discussion. It is impossible to print all the letters that we have received. But we intend to open our columns to full and free discussion.

One letter received calls for a short comment. It is from comrade C. Philip Skilton. He writes:—

Dear Comrade,—Your attack on Eric Gill in the October "Word" seems to call for challenge. The article is often not without truth but it is entirely without balance or charity. To dismiss Eric Gill as a very commonplace man of talent and his autobiography as unnecessary is bad judgment if not sheer spite.

On page 111 of "Autobiography" Eric Gill wrote "my socialism was from the beginning a revolt against the intellectual degradation of the factory hands and the damned ugliness of all that capitalist-industrialism produced, and it was not primarily a revolt against the cruelty and injustice of the possessing classes or against the misery of the poor."

Gill was not an orthodox socialist; he may more accurately be described as a Catholic anti-industrialist. As such he did not lack integrity and as such he exposed the system against which we campaign in a more merciless and uncompromising manner than any other man of his time. His pacifism (which you deny) was preached up to his death in 1940 and when many Socialists had conveniently forgotten the basis of their creed — the brotherhood of man.

...Eric Gill's many writings (and let the Socialist and Pacifist reader study them all) have the virtue of a clarity and directness which come only from a decided mind and integrated philosophy; his engravings and his sculpture enable him to rank as one of the foremost of workers in these media. His letter designs will for ever remain among the most perfect that the hand of man has produced. (His own type, it may be noted, has been used to head the article in which you denounce him.)

It is difficult in a brief letter to rebut conclusively some of your remarks concerning Gill, and I have not the time to write a longer one; I hope, however, that an indication has been given that the other side to the question does, as usual, exist.

Yours sincerely,

C. PHILIP SKILTON.

This is a poverty-stricken piece of special pleading in defence of a worthless and overrated character. We have no spite in the matter. But we refuse to dispense charity at the expense of truth, since that is to sacrifice the welfare of mankind to the post-mortem reputation of one individual. Our philosophy does not permit such license.

Why did not comrade Skelton answer the specific factual charges brought against Gill, which were stated clearly and without abuse?

These charges concerned:—

(1) Gill's conduct in relation to the last war.

(2) His attitude towards "Christian Marriage."

(3) His reason for leaving the Fabian Society.

(4) The War Memorial business.

Skilton runs away from the facts chronicled because there is no answer to them. He runs away from them because they destroy utterly Gill's pacifist reputation. And he cannot bear to see his idol destroyed. We have no time for idols and hypocrisy.

Eric Gill lacked integrity, as shown in his autobiography, in relation to the issues of war, Socialism, and "Christian Marriage". If Skilton thinks otherwise, let him answer each specific charge and not take refuge in generalisations and wishful assertions.

Are we to condone Gill's cowardly, self-interested, and absolutely morally reprehensible attitude during the last war; his hypocrisy concerning "Christian Marriage"; his war memorial prostitution of talent; and his Fabian Society episode, because he invented type that has been used for heading an essay? We did not deny that he invented a certain face of type. We impeach his reputation as a moralist, a Socialist, a thinker, and a man. And his apologist pleads that he could design type. What excellence! And what a plea! The truth is that our indictment is unanswerable and Gill cannot be defended. The man was worthless. His reputation was a masquerade.

We ask every reader to re-read our indictment and then treat this apology with the contempt it merits. Why must Skilton, himself a conchie, defend a man who acted as a mean, average orthodox militarist in war-time? Gill would have dodged the issue to the end if he could have done and he did hide himself behind the execution of utterly worthless work. Certainly work that no Anarchist ought to applaud and defend.

We indicted Gill because Herbert Read applauded him as a true Socialist and Herbert Read is read and circulated by certain Anarchists as "an Anarchist" writer.

In "The Politics of The Unpolitical (1943)," Read writes:—

. . . . Among Christ's direct disciples we must include several philosophers and poets nearer to our time, whose message is still insistent and directly applicable to our present condition—Ruskin and Kropotkin, Morris and Tolstoy, Gandhi and Eric Gill. These modern representatives of what we might call an ancient tradition form a closely interrelated body of thought. Gandhi, for example, has declared his debt to Ruskin and Tolstoy; Gill is a disciple of Morris, who was himself a disciple of Ruskin; Kropotkin was closely associated with Morris.

This is one of the most rubbishy generalisations ever palmed off on a long-suffering and too long-victimised humanity. It is intellectual pretence from beginning to end and will not bear analysis. And Kropotkin was not closely associated with Morris. There was no association at all.

Indicting "the cult of leadership," in Now, November, 1943, Herbert Read denounces the trade union officials for their irresponsibility—adding "perhaps it deserves a stronger word"—and concludes:—

"Responsibility is the alternative to leadership, and the counterpart of equality."

This is well said. But if there is one intellectual who has developed irresponsibility throughout his life, it is Herbert Read. For him to demand responsibility in individuals is a blasphemy against integrity. Anarchism means nothing if it does not mean propaganda by example.

Without capacity to exhibit example, Herbert Read naturally applauds Eric Gill, as one drunkard supports another in the name of eternal friendship—while in his cups! Intellectual irresponsibility is the worst form of intoxication.

CONFESSION.

House of Commons, Friday, 15th Dec., 1944.

Mr. Ivor Thomas (Labour) (Keighley): It is melancholy to think that after more than five years of fighting, in a war which we entered to defend the independence of Poland, we should be debating whether Poland is to be a State at all. For, make no mistake, that is the issue before us. The frontier question is entirely subordinate. I shall develop that in a few moments; but let me say now that if the proposals made by the Prime Minister this morning are in fact carried out—and I am not criticising the Prime Minister, because I think he may have been caught in what the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. H. Nicolson) recently called a chain of circumstances—if these proposals are carried out, the real victors will not be the Lublin Committee. They will be my hon. Friend the Member for Westboughton (Mr. R. J. Davies) and my hon. Friends who, on most other days except Fridays, sit on the benches below the gangway; if their case is not indeed proved, it will be greatly strengthened, for their case is that war settles nothing. If, at the end of six years of fighting, we see the causes for which we entered the war trampled underfoot, then, indeed, that case will be very much strengthened, and it will lead to a sense of cynicism and shame which will make it very difficult to get the people of this country to go to war again, however sacred the cause.

DEMOCRACY SPEAKING.

U.S.A. STUDIES

Freedom of Speech, of Writing, and the Right of Political Asylum are the fundamental traditions of the English-speaking nations. Daniel De Leon, speaking and writing as an avowed Socialist, emphasised this concept some years ago, when he insisted that the Stars and Stripes was, historically, the only Flag of Freedom among the national emblems. He explained that every Star and every Stripe stood for human liberty. War-zealous alleged American Socialists have exploited this notion to the limit for militarist purposes. It may have reconciled them to the red, white, and blue emblem that floats over the Capitol at Washington: but British Socialists will find it more difficult to explain the Union Jack. The truth is, Socialism has not emancipated itself from the thraldom of nationalism.

Traditionally, it may be true to assert that the English-speaking fraternities incline towards political and religious freedom. The belief is a healthy one, for it forwards the struggle towards the realisation of such equality of mental and social freedom. It defines a tendency, a strong tendency, but not a fact. Were the assertion true, there would be no colour problem in the United States and Jim Crowism would be unknown. The English-speaking countries are a long way off from enjoying social, political, or economic freedom, though the spirit of protest and demand is urgent. English is the language of liberty, but it has to use the opposition benches. As witness these notes, describing conditions operating in the United States during the interlude between two world wars.

Parliamentarians, alike in U.S.A. and Britain, since the outbreak of World War Two have denounced Fascists and Fascism, and justified the suspension of habeas corpus on the ground that the victims were Fascists, collaborators, and foreign-born loyalists of the Fascist Powers. This is not true. Between 1918 and 1939, the Democracies, as the United States and British Governments termed themselves, collaborated with the Fascist Powers against the enemies and victims of Fascism. In a word, the parliamentarians, now proclaiming their war-time ideals of democracy, treated democracy as an illusion when it most mattered. They evinced a real hatred of the great principle of democracy. They denied the right to Freedom of Speech and Writing, the right to complete liberty and equality of citizenship in these two matters, of the foreign-born. This was especially true in the United States. It was less true in Great Britain.

The right to speak, irrespective of place of birth, is not a concession to the speaker or writer who may be born abroad. Paine and Jefferson ought to have convinced American folk of this truth. It is the fundamental and unquestionable right of the citizen in his own country to learn all that anyone can say on any subject. The right of speech is to be original and not to be coerced. This has been maintained in Britain in other days and the heritage has been fought for in New England. The land of Theodore Parker, Emerson, James Russell Lowell, Whittier, and Whitman has no right to suffer oppression or admit despotism and dictatorship. We have stressed this theme in pre-war years and we return to it to-day with vigour.

The now forgotten (by Socialists) arrest and persecution of Vincent Ferrero and Domenick Sallito give point to these remarks. Ferrero was confined on Ellis Island on December 28, 1935 and Sallito on January 14, 1936. The latter had been confined previously at Angels Island, San Francisco, for two months. Both were released, on a thousand dollar bond each, on April 4, 1936, pending an appeal to the Superior Federal Courts, against the refusal of Federal Judge Frances G. Caffey, of New York, to grant a writ of habeas corpus. In the end, their appeals were unsuccessful.

The immigration inspector of Oakland, Cal., filed this secret note to the Washington authorities, on September 8, 1935, with reference to Sallito:—

"I understand that the Italian Consul is very much interested in the deportation of this alien, and would be only too glad to issue a passport for this alien's return to Italy."

Edward W. Cahill, the District Commissioner of Immigration at San Francisco, and erstwhile supporter of Upton Sinclair in his Epic campaign, communicated to Commissioner D. W. McCormick a statement that Ferrero and Sallito "appear to be rather proud of being labelled as Anarchists," adding:—

"Should they succeed in overcoming the order of deportation, we shall have to be prepared to 'take it on the chin,' as the publicity will be very much against our department."

The question of justice was no concern of this cowardly official and supporter of Upton Sinclair. Ferrero and Sallito had committed the "offence" of letting a room to the English-speaking Anarchist paper Man! Therefore the question of democracy and constitutional right involved in these arrests and deportations was: Has an Anarchist journal, against which no legal charge has been made, any right to be issued? If it had, then Ferrero and Sallito never ought to have been arrested and held for deportation. Actually, Man was an Anti-Fascist journal and the democratic immigration authorities stood for handing these Anti-Fascist refugees over to the Fascist Government of Italy which the Democratic United States Government denounced.

The same issues arose in the case of Emil Gardos, editor of Uj Elore, Hungarian working-class paper published in Cleveland. A warrant of deportation was issued by Commissioner of Immigration Daniel W. McCormick, on February 27, 1936. Because of his allegiance to the workers' cause in America, his splendid work in assisting to organise the textile strike of 1926, in Passaic, N.J., Gardos' citizenship was revoked in 1934. At the hearing before Federal Judge Geiger, of Milwaukee, Wis., in reply to questions, Gardos said: "I have no higher loyalty than my loyalty to my class." Whereupon, the Judge declared that Gardos had taken the oath of naturalisation with "mental reservations," and so ordered his citizenship revoked.

Geiger, a die-hard Republican, refused to hear references to the Bill of Rights, the Declaration of Independence, the sayings of Thomas Paine and Abraham Lincoln.

"Bill of Rights," he sneered, "No; property rights are supreme."

"You Communists," he said again, in his most judicial impartial manner, "would take away the home or the farm of a man acquired after a life of hard labour."

"No, your Honour!" Gardos said, "it is being done every day now by the mortgage holders, backed by court rulings."

Judge Geiger was right. Property rights are supreme, and, of course, business is business. Take, for example, this April 1936 gem from the "Public Notice" column of the New York Herald Tribune, which speaks volumes:—

"Walt Whitman Birthplace, Huntington, Long Island, for sale; widely advertised, historic landmark; main highway; ideal inn, roadhouse. Apply Elizabeth Putt, 46 Lawrence Street, Brooklyn."

In 1916, the advertiser acquired for 5000 dollars the modest dwelling in which the most American of the American poets was born. The Whitman Society was anxious to secure the place as a Whitman land-mark but the sum asked, twenty years later, was 30,000 dollars for the cottage and garden! Believing that business is more typical of society than poetry, the owners preferred to sell to some enterprising innkeeper with dollars galore to invest who would jump at the chance to lure the between-wars Sunday autoists and speed maniacs to take their gin and ham sandwiches while they let off pent-up noise in the place where the boy Walt dreamed!

After all, what has modern America to do with Whitman, the poet of Freedom!

Fred Werrmann, who came to the U.S.A., a political refugee, in 1926, was arrested by the Chicago "Red" Squad during an unemployment demonstration, on September 27, 1934. He was ordered to be deported by the Department of Labor on the ground that he was a member of the Communist Party. When he reached Ellis Island, his case was fought by the American Committee for the Protection of the Foreign-Born. Finally, the Mexican Government in 1936, through its Embassy, announced that it would grant Werrmann the right of political asylum.

Whilst extending asylum to Werrmann, so that he might not go back to certain imprisonment and possible death in Germany, the Mexican Government arrested Plutarco Elias Calles, former Mexicamn President, with three colleagues, on April 10, 1936, and shunted him across the border of the United States to Texas.

Don Agalos was deported from the U.S.A., at midnight, Feb. 18, 1934. He entered the United States in 1910, at the age of fourteen. He went to Omah, Nebraska, then to North Platte, then to Great Falls, Montana. In Butte, Agalos participated in the Great General Strike of 1917, and, in 1922, in the Shop Craft Strike in Montana. With the same spirit, he led the Unemployment Councils and the fight to organise the railroad workers. On June 29, 1933, Agalos was arrested in Spokane, Washington, and held for deportation.

On Friday, February 14, 1936, Der Deutsche Staats-Zeitung, a German Nazi newspaper published in New York, printed the following under the heading GERMAN GENERAL CONSULATE:

"The above-mentioned persons are asked to report, or deliver their address at the German General Consulate, 17 Battery Place, Room 1941, in the hours of 9 a.m. to 2 p.m., Saturdays until 12. At the same time those who know about the present whereabouts of those listed are asked to inform the German Consulate."

And, down the list appeared the name:

"Saupe, Walter, born May 2, 1916, in Penig."

Monday, February 17, three days later, Walter Saupe, ninteen-year-old refugee from Nazi oppression, was arrested without a warrant by an Immigration Inspector at the Louvre Buffet, 50 John Street, and taken to Ellis Island! This same emigration official will be found busy to-day denouncing Nazi concentration camps!

Mrs. Mabel Eaton, of Bloomfield, N.J., lost the custody of her children by virtue of the husband producing as evidence her unfitness—the Communist Manifesto and an I.W.W. songbook.

Congressman Vito Marcontomo, erstwhile buddy of Mayor La Guardia of New York City, found himself arrested by La Guardia's police chief when he attempted to lead an unemployment demonstration. The police chief termed it "protective custody."

Leslie Cleary, District Attorney of Stanislaus County, Cal., demanded that two professors, Dr. Max Radin and Harry Canover, be dismissed because in struggles between workers and exploiters, they dared to take the side of the workers.

Major William L. Ball presided over a meeting in New York City on February 29, 1936, where Phelps, former assemblyman spluttered: "The only Thing the radical knows is force, and he must be met with the same weapon."

That alienism and hatred of the foreign-born is parish-capitalism and not patriotism, the restriction on migration within the U.S.A. proves.

During the winter of 1935-6, the rulers of Florida turned back 10,000 transients, classed as "vagrants". They attempted to enter the State, in order to seek a warmer shelter for their worn-down bodies. But even sunshine and air were limited, the second world-war not having been visioned, only to those who can pay for it. So decreed the rulers of the richest play resort in the country!

The next year California's fascist rulers emulated the Florida ones.

The Los Angeles chief of police and the Chambers of Commerce stationed patrols on every state border entrance, and invaded the cheaper rooming houses of the city, in order to keep out and rid the city of the "angels" and "vagrants."

During 1936, the former Barbara Hutton, who had sent a poor fool to prison in London, asked the Board of Tax Appeals in Washington to review a 25,108 dollars income-tax deficiency assessed by the Treasury from 1933. The Woolworth heiress claimed that she was entitled to a deduction of 130,000 dollars "in expenses incurred by her guardian in the management of her large estate prior to November 14, 1933, the date she attained her majority." No tax was paid by Miss Hutton that year. The government—a notoriously conservative estimator in such cases—estimated her fortune as 45,00,000 dollars.

Contrast this news item with that eulogising Mrs .Henry Morgenthau, Senior, mother of the Secretary of the Treasury, for handing a cheque of 100 dollars to the principal of Public School 14 in New York City to be expended for needy pupils in any way the principal thought wise.

The gift was used by Miss Moore the principal, for 26 families, mostly for groceries and clothing. Donations from the 100 dollars included 25 cents to send a child, too ill to walk, home from school; 8 dollars for burial clothes for a child killed in an accident, whose father was out of work; 8 dollars 97 cents for a family of seven, with five children undernourished, in need of clothing. The small income of the father, was unable to provide enough to eat, to wear, or to provide a decent home.

Twenty-six "lifts" from 100 dollars! No tax due—130,000 dollars needed for expenses to manage the estate of one of America's outstanding parasites, whose child was born in London, and who is treated in England with all the freedom of a distinguished citizen! No deportation here!

Evidence taken from the files of Federal Laboratories, Inc., of Pittsburgh, the principal American seller of tear gas and sickening gas, and placed before a group of U.S. investigators shows that major American industries made large secret purchases of tear gas, guns and ammunition in anticipation of strikes. The vice-president of the Federal Laboratories wrote to the Smith and Wesson Company pistol manufacturers of Springfield, Mass.

I hope you will let nothing prevent your shipping out to us for the Weirton Steel Co., Weirton, W. Va., the 47 .38 military and police S. & W. six-inch barrel revolvers.

We will send you a confirming requisition for your permanent record to-day, and ask that the invoice be made out to Weirton Steel; on account of their desire that their employees be not familiar with what they are doing, they require that we use great secrecy in the way bills are handled.

Other firms listed as buyers of arms for such sinister purposes included Cudahy Packing Co., H. C. Frick Coke Co., Southern Natural Gas Co., Tennessee Coal, Iron & Railroad Corp. and Gulf States Steel Co., all of Birmingham, Ala.

Meanwhile the Rust Brothers, inventors of the mechanical cotton picker, were living in Utopia and dreamland. Interviewed by the Cincinnati "Post," John Rust announced that the brothers would forego all profits on their invention, in order that the machine might be "a blessing, and not a curse to mankind."

John Rust said :—

We got down on our knees and picked cotton when we were boys. We decided then that we would try to invent a machine to do this back-breaking labour. We have that machine. It will do the work of 50 to 100 men.

We are convinced that exploitation of our invention would create untold disaster. Thrown on the market in the manner of past inventions, it would mean that 75 per cent. of the labour population would be thrown out of employment.

Machine elimination is not stopped because an inventor renounces profits. Inventions will bless humanity only under Socialism. Men of genius, like the Rust brothers, should work for the Coming Socialist Republic, the Anarchist Commonwealth, if they would redeem the world from mercenary burdens. And the proletariat should reduce the militarists in their own ranks, the flag-waving war-mongers who accepted Nazi and Fascist Governments in peace-time, hounded extreme Socialists and Anarchists back to concentration camps from political asylum, and now shout for death and glory. To these militarists, democracy means merely servitude to power and authority equally in peace and war. Their democracy is a phantasy and a masquerade. They are the charlatan bureaucrats who rejoice in irresponsible authority and perpetual dictatorship. When democracy does speak, when English really becomes—as is its right—the basic language of freedom, these poor pretenders will be cast into a much deserved desolation of oblivion. Their status and their authority will pass like some evil shadow of social night.

WAR DOESN'T PAY

By R. G. GLASS

Yes, I am a confirmed pacifist now—because from bitter experience I've found that war doesn't pay!

No, I'm not talking about my war service either, even although I was 8½ years in the Navy—before the war, though.

I mean my own private war—which I have waged for six long years—principally against myself, and anyone else who happened to be involved by my way of thinking.

And now every time I look at my dear adopted mother's face, I realise what a silly headstrong fool I have been, and what harm I have done and am doing myself as long as I remain at war.

No, it's no good at all—much better to accept things as they are, and face up to the facts of life—hard though they may seem—so much easier than trying to escape, as this only makes it worse, and isn't the least bit brave.

Oh, admittedly, it almost broke my heart to leave the Navy and all my pals, because I didn't know any other life, and had no brothers or sisters, and my father and mother existed in name only to me—so I always used to dread coming "home" on leave—which, needless to say, I seldom did, preferring to do my service abroad.

Well, when I was invalided from the Navy, I decided I'd go home and square things up—but, as soon as my pension came through, I'd beat it back down South.

But my pension didn't come through as easily as I expected (of course I was so well disciplined joining up as a boy, that I didn't argue about it), but my parents not being well off and living from hand to mouth sort of thing, and didn't like the idea of me being foisted on them penniless and unfit besides.

So after a lot of correspondence with the Admiralty I eventually got a small pension—but by this time I was beginning to worry and think what a raw deal the Navy was giving me, as my illness was definitely contracted on service and I was one of the "cream of Britain's youth" on joining.

So I began getting dumped in various hospitals, until I was so demoralised that my illness developed to such an extent that my parents refused to take me back. I was removed, a quivering wreck of humanity at 25, to endure the mental tortures of the Poorhouse.

So naturally, being a very sensitive and proud young man, I felt more like a hunted animal that had been eventually trapped through no fault of his own than a human being, so I just lost interest in life and classified everyone as my enemy.

But I had met one good friend whom I liked and admired very much, and when he heard about my "incarceration" in that hospital, he visited me and immediately took steps to get me removed to a more suitable environment. Well, he succeeded, and I was transferred to an ex-Servicemen's hospital, which would have been all right if I hadn't been kept amongst a lot of poor old men all the time, and made to feel I was only there on sufferance as my pension didn't cover my "cost of living." I felt this keenly, although quite a few were pensioners. It was a wealthy institution, specially for disabled soldiers and sailors, so I needn't have worried.

But I got over that, and determined to get fit in spite of everything, I was managing fairly well, and although my parents visited me occasionally, they wouldn't co-operate and get me a holiday at all.

My friend had taken ill and died unknown to me meantime; otherwise he would have arranged this, I expect. But his landlady wrote and told me that he had died, and arranged to visit me.

Well, she is now my mother, and I love her and am proud of her, after even fighting against her love and all that I have received.

But I can't deceive myself any longer, no matter how hard I try, and no matter how hard it feels.

I should know—that war doesn't pay!

UNION OF DEMOCRATIC CONTROL

The U.D.C. Scottish Federation has been fortunate in securing the services of the DUKE OF BEDFORD as speaker at their next meeting, which will be held in the Central (Grand) Hall, 25 Bath St., on Sunday, 11th February, at 3 o'clock.

The Duke has chosen for his subject:

"SOME PROBLEMS OF THE PRESENT DAY AND POST WAR WORLD."

His striking views on political and financial questions are known to thoughtful people all over the English-speaking world, and they are well worth hearing.

Members of the U.D.C., and all Pacifists and Socialists are asked to make this a bumper meeting. Come and bring all your friends: make the meeting widely known. It is our duty to understand conditions and events in order to make sure that, this time, Peace shall be just and lasting.

Admission is free. There will be a collection to defray expenses. Discussion is invited.

Those interested in the work of the U.D.C., should write to me at the U.D.C. Office, 54 Gordon St., Glasgow, C.1.

HELIB T. LOW,
Secretary.

The Duke of Bedford speaks in Glasgow On SUNDAY, 11th FEBRUARY, 11 a.m. for the STUDY CIRCLE, and for ST. MARGARETS' OPEN FORUM, Polmadie, at 7.30 p.m.

THE OBSTRUCTION

A Modern Parable

By E. E. BRISCOE

In a country where, despite much protestation of freedom and democracy, the rich "ruled the roost," there dwelt a wealthy and aristocratic squire. This squire, a retired brigadier-general, owned a great portion of the land, including a number of villages and a small market town, the inhabitants of which rented their farms and cottages from him, and were, most of them, employed by him in various work on the estate. Within his domain his word was law, and none dared openly to oppose him: for if any ever questioned his authority or interfered with his schemes he dismissed them from his employment and turned them out of their abodes.

Once, in the past, a few men of strong character and exceptional courage had banded together and attempted to resist him in an unjust process; but having no support from the rest of the tenants, who were afraid to join with them, they had suffered the inevitable penalty, and they, with their families, were cast adrift.

Since then the people had generally succumbed to a state of dull submission, thinking it expedient to remember whence came their "daily bread."

Now, near the Squire's residence, on a space of grass bordering the narrow, but most frequented, road through the estate, there was a great barn. It was a store-house for machinery and implements used by the labourers on the land; and, owing to the Squire's tyrannical system of conducting his affairs, was commonly called the Armaments Barn. Just beyond it the road turned abruptly and ascended a steep hill. Here was a very dangerous situation for motorists; for the position of the barn made it impossible to see what lay ahead.

There were many accidents; and, as time passed, many were the killed and injured. The people murmured among themselves, and all agreed that if the barn were pulled down the accidents would cease.

At last one man, regardless of consequences to himself, went to the Squire and besought him, for the sake of common humanity, to demolish the barn.

"What!" roared the Squire, ruby red with rage, "My barn, that has stood there for over three hundred years! Pull it down? You're impudent! and—and, damn you, you're sacked. Get out!"

The following day there was another fatal accident. Then the Squire, still fuming at the threat to his property, began to think.—He'd "see everyone in hell" before he'd demolish his barn; but perhaps "noblesse oblige" and "the old school tie" made it advisable for him to do something or other in the matter.

A few days later he sent out notices announcing that he was having a dilapidated cottage, which had become unfit for occupation, repaired, and equipped with beds and necessary furniture for "first aid" treatment of those who happened to be injured in road accidents on his estate. He also made arrangements with a local doctor to attend whenever required, and informed the parson that he would probably be wanted. Finally he called upon the young men to volunteer for stretcher-bearing, in terms that hinted at the foolishness of refusal.

The Armaments Barn remained, and the road accidents continued; while the Squire never tired of telling everyone that he was doing all he possibly could to relieve the sufferings of the victims, and that he was prepared to go to even greater expense in provision for the "cottage hospital," if it became necessary.

Then a dreadful thing occurred. The Squire, who enjoyed "good wine and good company," was returning in his powerful car from a convivial gathering in celebration of the New Year. The night was bitterly cold, the roads slippery with ice, and he passed through intermittent patches of fog as he raced recklessly homewards.

Before he was aware, he reached the hill, and went rushing down the steep descent. At the bottom the car skidded and crashed into the barn!

At break of day a farm labourer passing, on his way to work, was astonished when he saw the barn. The end by the road was shattered, and the splintered timbers were strewn around. Entering the barn, through the gaping cavity, he found the overturned, crumpled car, and lying beside it the dead body of the Squire. Horrified, he hastened away, and gave the alarm. Later he returned with some of his fellow stretcher-bearers, and they carried the body to the "cottage hospital."

The remains of the Squire were consigned to the family vault in the parish churchyard: and his son "reigned in his stead."

Then the people became hopeful. "Now, surely," they said, "the new Squire will pull down the barn, and the disasters will cease."

Alas, it was not so. The young Squire was a "chip of the old block-head"; and he immediately ordered his workmen to repair the barn.

Roused, at last, from their obsequuious submission, all of the tenants flouted his authority; and there was not one who would consent to do the work. The Squire threatened them with the usual penalties, but they remained firm in their opposition; which inspired with sympathy, and brought support from a great number of people outside the estate.

So the Squire obtained workers from a distant town: but when these men learned the truth they refused to continue, and went away; and although the Squire got many more men from far-away places, they all packed up their tools and departed as soon as they knew the facts.

After being thwarted at every turn, the Squire suddenly became sane; and breaking away from the family tradition, he entered upon some honest thinking. The result greatly surprised him; for very soon he found himself formulating ideas of life which hitherto had never developed in his mind. He saw the Armaments Barn with new eyes, and became aware of its sinister significance: and—he saw himself.

Without delay he called together the people of the estate, and made confession. "By God!" he concluded, "I've been a sanguinary fool—a sadistic idiot. I now realise that humanity is the thing that matters. That cursed barn must go."

It went. Since then the dread of recurrent calamity has gone, and a new spirit of mutual respect and confidence exists between the Squire and his tenants, which is expressed in altruistic thought and co-operative effort for the welfare of all.

OUR OLDEST READER.

George Gorman, formerly of Oakley, Fife, and long resident in Middlechurch, Manitoba, is our oldest reader.

As we go to press we received an interesting letter from him, and a poem composed in his honour by our Comrade, C. R. McFarlane.

The letter reads:—

My Dear Comrade Aldred,—I enclose one Dollar in payment of "The Word" for another year. I am glad always to get it. And I hope that you will be long spared to speak and write as fearlessly as you do. The paper is a treat to me.

We folk here have an idea that unless Churchill shows more common sense, he will be a fallen idol, like Hitler and Mussolini. We will see.

Wishing you all success, and all the good things of life, or at least what you may count the good things of life, the leisure to study and to create and serve.

One great admirer,

GEORGE GORMAN.

Middle Church, Manitoba, Dec. 14, 1944.

Comrade Gorman writes this letter in a bold, clear hand-writing, in pencil. We receive many friendly letters, as well as many bitter and antagonistic ones. This is one of the most directly inspiring letters ever written to us.

The poem, which will lighten these pages considerably, and will be appreciated in Fife by Comrades who know our Comrade Gorman, as well as by his friends in Canada, reads as follows:—

GEORGE GORMAN

(Born Oakley, Fife, November 11, 1853).

I'm brisk and spry, though a wee bit shy
To craw or blaw my horn.
But a secret I'll tell, between you and I,
This is my birthday morn!
Oh! I'm ninety-one to-day!

Chorus:

Yes! I'm ninety-one to-day,
And as blythe as the birds in May.
I can sing and dance,
And I'm full o' romance,
For I'm ninety-one to-day!

Lang syne in Fife, I began my life,
In a wee butt and ben on the brae.
At the hour o' seven—November eleven
I entered the world—to stay
And I'm ninety-one to-day!

You may think I am auld, that I feel the cauld
But it's much the other way.
I'm frisky as a Kitten
Wear neither scarf nor mitten,
And I'm ninety-one to-day!

The doctors threep, I'm a human jeep,
That can skelp through stoor and glaur.
They have it in mind, that a man o' my kind,
Can outlast Hitler and war.
Gings, I'm ninety-one to-day!

When Hitler's forgotten, and is dust in his grave,
I'll still lead the young and the brave.
Thanks to Brose and Oat Meal,
I could tackle the Deil
Gings, I'm ninety-one to-day.

Chorus:

Gings, I'm ninety-one to-day
And as blythe as the birds in May.
I can sing and dance,
And I'm full o' romance,
For I'm ninety-one to-day!

"COMMUNISTS" and The Labour Party

The Scottish Sunday Express for November, 1944, published the following report:—

POLLITT'S CALL TO LABOUR PARTY.
"Work with us."

Co-operation between Labour and Communist parties to fight the General Election was urged by Harry Pollitt, General Secretary of the Communist Party, at a conference in Glasgow yesterday.

"We can bring strength and virility to the Labour Party," he said, "which is rapidly falling into stagnation."

Chairman William Gallacher, M.P., asked: "If Churchill and Stalin can work together to defeat Fascism, why can't Morrison and Pollitt work together to beat Toryism?"

William Pearson, president of Lanarkshire Miners' Union: "It is nonsense to say that members of the Communist Party can't be trusted to-day."

A similar report appeared in other papers. These statements take one's breath away for sheer audacity, in view of the record of the Communist Party.

The New Leader for May 13, 1932, published the following enlightening paragraph.

THE BROCKWAY-POLLITT DEBATE.

The speeches of Harry Pollitt and Fenner Brockway at the London "C.P.—I.L.P." debate in April, are now available in twopenny pamphlet form from the C.P. headquarters at 16 King Street, W.C.2. Apparently the workers are not to be allowed to read the speeches, and judge for themselves the two policies. It has been found necessary to add a typically C.P. foreword by William Rust!

The debate took place at the Memorial Hall, London, on April 18, 1932.

The Foreword by William Rust was written in the typically, aggressive, we-are-right, no-matter-how-often-we-change-our-coats style of the Communist Party. We cite some interesting paragraphs from this preface:

The debate between Harry Pollitt and Fenner Brockway at the Memorial Hall, on April 18, attracted large numbers of London workers. The hall was crammed full and many hundreds were turned away. There was no mistaking the views of the audience: it was overwhelmingly in favour of the Communist Party's policy of revolutionary class struggle.

The reader of this report will be struck by the deliberate way in which Brockway attempted to cover up the anti-working class policy of the Independent Labour Party by continual pleas for unity and the claim that the differences between the Communist Party and I.L.P. would tend to disappear as the crisis of capitalism grew . . . .

. . . . His shuffling was of no avail against Pollitt's searching criticism, which showed that whatever variations the I.L.P. may play on the Labour Party tune, it actually stands for the policy of the Labour Party and has nothing to offer the workers other than trust in a third Labour Government.

This is the real meaning of Brockway's unity talk. He wants the unity of corrupt leaders in order to deceive the workers. He wants unity with the Hendersons and Lansburys. Only Pollitt spoke for real unity: that is, the unity of the working class in struggle against the capitalists and the Labour leaders who are nothing but the agents of the capitalists. . . .

The fight against the war is now the central issue before the working class of this country, and it is precisely upon this issue that the I.L.P. comes out and says: leave it to the leaders of the trade unions and the Labour Party, the very leaders who are supporting the policy of the Government and the capitalists, and attempting to disorganise and split the ranks of the workers.

Harry Pollitt showed that the way out of the capitalist crisis is only possible through revolutionary class struggle, and that only the Communist Party organises day in and day out for the working-class solution of the crisis.

The speeches of Fenner Brockway were just another proof that, with words of Socialism on their lips, the I.L.P. leaders betray the struggle of the working class and that their party has become a part of the capitalist machine for crushing the workers and preventing the onward march to a free Socialist Britain.

Consider this preface. Consider the arrogant false pretences of the party that could publish such a preface. Overwhelming support for the Communist Party's policy of revolutionary class struggle! Shuffling support of the Labour Party's policy! Nothing to offer but a third Labour Government! The real meaning of unity talk: Unity with corrupt leaders to deceive the workers! And now—the man who wants the third Labour Government, who sees no hope beyond a third Labour Government is Harry Pollitt! The words in his debate, the noise, the heat, the denunciation, the cheers: all so much unmitigated humbug engaged in by a power-intoxicated, contemptible, self-seeking careerist politician!

Let us look at Pollitt's speeches in the debate itself from this Communist Party report.

In his first speech, Pollitt said (pages 3-11):

The issues that we have to fight out this evening are, in our opinion, vital to the whole future of the working-class movement of this country. This is not a debate between two parties who have a common aim and are only separated by certain differences of tactics, such as their attitude to Parliament, violence, Labour Party, etc. This is not a debate between two parties, one of whom is a little more "advanced" and a little more "extreme" than the other. This is a debate which represents, in every meaning of the word, war between the Communist Party, a party of the working class, which strives to build up the daily fight of the workers, seeking that struggle to strengthen the working class fight, until by revolutionary action we can destroy the whole apparatus of the capitalist State and end the domination and exploitation that it represents both for the workers in this country and the workers and peasants in the colonial countries; and the party known as the INDEPENDENT LABOUR PARTY WHICH, IN OUR JUDGMENT, AS WE SHALL ATTEMPT TO PROVE, IS NOT A PARTY OF THE WORKING CLASS, IS NOT A PARTY OF SOCIALISM, BUT IS A PARTY OF CAPITALISM which hinders and retards the workers' daily struggles, which confuses and disorganises the workers' fight, AND WHOSE SOCIALISM IS A BASTARD SOCIALISM which involves nothing more or less than acquiescence in every theory appertaining to the capitalist State and the administration of all that the capitalist State power represents.

My job is to prove these assertions and accusations. Let us for a moment take the way in which the Labour movement in this country has developed; what has constituted the basis upon which the Labour movement of this country has developed? The basis has been the possibility in England to deny revolution, to deny revolutionary struggle, and, by capturing Parliament, so to wield that institution that it would be possible to modify and reorganise conditions that we can thus pass through capitalist prosperity, to the establishment of what is described as a Socialist Commonwealth. And so long as the basis of the Labour movement of this country has rested on that assumption, on the capturing of Parlioament, and of the denial of the revolutionary struggle and aim, it has naturally led to the inevitable sequel which we have seen in the experience of two Labour Governments, namely, taking over the apparatus of the capitalist State, administering that apparatus in the interests of capitalism, defending capitalism, making peace with capitalism and perhaps, what is more important, as I hope to show in my concluding remarks, actually being used for the purpose of holding down the colonial peoples by means more bloody and repressive than the open capitalist parties would ever dare to attempt.

The culminating point of this process was seen last Autumn in the complete exposure and collapse of the second Labour Government, a Labour Government let it be remembered, that was elected with the full support and backing of the I.L.P. just as the I.L.P. to-day are engaged in turning the eyes of the masses from the immediate fight on to the question of waiting until another General Election "and give us a majority of real Socialists in Parliament." The exposure and collapse of the second Labour Government was the inevitable outcome of the whole policy upon which the Labour movement of this country has developed . . . .

There is no difference between the Labour Party and the I.L.P. however much is said in speeches and written in newspaper articles. The way of the Labour Party and the I.L.P., the way of all reformists has been demonstrated to every thinking man and woman in this country as a way which simply leads to the possibility of the capitalists finding the way out of the crisis at the expense of the working class. I say the path for the working class is that of mobilising all their forces for the conquest of power.

At this point perhaps it will be interesting to give the reply of the Communist International in 1919, when the I.L.P. put to Moscow the question: What is the difference between Communism and other forms of Socialism? And Comrade Lenin, who drafted the pamphlet "Moscow's Reply to the I.L.P.," attached sufficient importance to this question to give considerable attention to drafting this reply even with the situation as acute as it was at that particular time, in the Soviet Union. This is what is said:—

"To the question of the British I.L.P.: In what respect does Communism differ from other forms of Socialism?" we reply: "There are no other forms; there is only Communism. Whatever else goes under the name of Socialism is either wilful deception by the lackeys of the bourgeoisie or the self-deception of persons or groups who hesitate to choose between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie, who hesitate to choose between a life and death struggle, and the role of assistants to the expiring bourgeoisie."

And that definition and that formulation of the fundamental distinctions between the Communists and the reformists is a classic definition and a classic formulation, and has been proved one hundred per cent. correct by every event that has taken place since Lenin wrote these words. . . .

What is the line of the I.L.P. at the moment? It is to bring forward a third alternative—"a majority Labour Government," a "majority Labour Government of convinced Socialists," a "Parliament in which we have a majority of I.L.Pers." . . .

Comrades, the significance of these articles and this line of policy is that this "new" change in I.L.P. policy only takes place after events have proved the bankruptcy of every previous policy they have advocated. . . .

In 1919, when there was a reolutionary ferment all over the world, when revolution was breaking out in country after country, the I.L.P. at that time could blandly talk about affiliating to Moscow, and if to-day the capitalist class of this country can emerge from the present economic crisis as a result of the disorganisation of the workers' fight caused by the treachery and deceit of the Labour Party and the Trades Union Congress and the I.L.P., we shall find the I.L.P. again making a series of political somersaults.

The central question is one which must be fearlessly explained to the workers; that they have to build up, however slowly and patiently, with whatever trouble and sacrifice it may involve, the organisation and leadership that can, by revolutionary action, lead to the conquest of power and the destruction of the whole apparatus of capitalist exploitation and the capitalist State. And our party is the only party which gives a clear lead on this position. . . .

Capitalism has a way out—a way out through wage cuts, the Means Test, tariffs, fascism, WAR! And we are in a war period now. This is the capitalist way out of the crisis, and any talk about the automatic collapse of capitalism, any talk about capitalism having no way out of the crisis, leads to fatalism and disorganising of the workers' fight. It leads to the "Let 'em starve" theory, the theory that the more you crush the workers, the more they will rise. And there was never a more non-revolutionary theory in all history. We have to learn how to help the workers' struggle in the daily fight against the capitalist offensive now. But we are met with the remark that "the workers are apathetic," that "the workers won't struggle," and in the next breath they call upon the workers to "wait until the next General Election." That is what hinders and sabotages the workers' fight. If disillusionment exists, and that disillusionment is not expressing itself in a revolutionary way, what is the reason? Is it the fault of the working class or of the leadership of the reformist labour movement of this country?

Week by week Brailsford and Wise advocate open capitalist policies, Dollan in "Forward" advocates the good old Labour Party way out. Take the recent Blackpool Conference of the I.L.P.: Cullen, speaking for the so-called revolutionary group in the I.L.P., says: "Make the policy revolutionary." Maxton and Brockway cry: "The policy is revolutionary." Dollan says: "Let's stick to the good old Labour Party's reformist policy and get Socialism through Parliament." Comrades, these are all leaders of the I.L.P. Leading where? Something for everybody, eh, but nothing for anybody but the capitalists. Comrades, this confusion is not accidental, not a result of stupidity, not a mistake. It is the deliberate policy of the I.L.P. It is consciously thought out, fostered and stimulated in order to confuse the struggle, to create doubt and hesitation in the minds of the workers, and it is the greatest crime that has ever been committed against the working-class movement that week by week this confusion can pour out its poison when one considers the situation with which the working class is faced to-day; wage cuts, the Means Test, tariffs, and now the entry of capitalism upon its war period. Therefore, comrades, with such a party there can be no talk of unity, no talk of anything so common, and there can be only war to the death.

What is the line of the Communist Party? We say that we know our task and, with all our mistakes, try to carry it out—to explain to the workers the real meaning of the crisis, that there is a crisis a thousand times more acute than is generally realised, a crisis in which the issue is revolution or starvation. . . .

We endeavour to build up the workers' fighting power in the factories, in the unions, at the Labour Exchanges, to participate in all of their economic struggles. We fight for the common solidarity of the British workers, Indian, Irish, Chinese, African, and Egyptian workers and peasants. We fight for the complete withdrawal of the troops from Shanghai and from all colonial countries. We stand for the complete independence of all colonial countries. We advance the demands of the workers, not as an end in themselves, but in order to strengthen the workers fight against capitalism and go forward to the conquest of power. We stand for revolutionary propaganda, not only amongst the workers, but amongst the armed forces, amongst the soldiers, sailors and airmen. And if the I.L.P. suggests that if force must be used, better let it be when a Labour Government has a majority, will the I.L.P.ers explain how you are going to get the forces to carry out the demands of a Labour Government unless you carry on the same revolutionary propaganda amongst the soldiers as you do amongst the miners and boilermakers? And anyhow, have not the two Labour Governments used the armed forces to shoot down defenceless colonial workers and used the police to baton strikers and imprisoned workers for conducting propaganda among the armed forces? We point out that the capitalist State is the supreme instrument for the exploitation and coercion of the working class at home and abroad.

Brockway made a somewhat conciliatory reply. Pollitt would have none of it. In his second speech he stressed the Communist Party opposition to the Labour Party and to a United Front with the I.L.P. and the Labour Party.

He blamed the Left Social Democracy in Italy for the triumph of Mussolini and the Left Social Democracy in Germany for the advances made by Hitler in Germany.

TO OUR READERS.

Just a little necessary straight talk and explanation.

Very early in the war some of our contemporaries reduced their size and kept their price. They became almost unreadable. Others increased their price. Some adopted the double practice of reducing their size and increasing their price, because of war-time necessity!

We kept our size, refusing to carry trade or paid advertisements, and we refused to increase the price.

This meant we have struggled under the burden of a heavy monthly deficit. This is not fair to us, nor yet to the few Comrades who have supported us. Until now we have endeavoured to carry on without increasing the price, despite suggestions that we should do so. We are reluctant to do so even now, but circumstances compel us to take this step. We write and publish for and to the poor, and must expect loss.

Apart from the fact that, even if we sold every copy issued at twopence, instead of supplying a large quantity at trade rates, we should still be losing, we are faced with a further loss: Groups that we know have sold the papers and have even increased their orders, and bookshops that send in regular orders, owe us large sums. This is mean in view of the struggle we are making. But it is a fact. With reluctance we are cutting off supplies to these centres. We ask Comrades to become individual subscribers. Every Comrade who becomes a subscriber before March 1, will receive the paper at the present rate, post-free, every month for twelve months, for 3s. We say: Send that Subscription—and Send NOW.

The March issue will be increased to threepence (3d.). Postage will be one penny extra. The Annual Subscription from March onwards will be four shillings instead of three. The U.S.A. price will remain five cents.

To continue our work we need to add to our machinery and we carry a heavy debt. Will you help us?

If circumstances justify the charge, with our debts cleared, we shall return to the popular price of 2d. Meantime, we must increase the cost to 3d. per issue, post-free, 4d.

FREEDOM, EAST AND WEST

By PEARL S. BUCK

[This article was published in "Common Sense Magazine," U.S.A., in September, 1942. Pearl S. Buck is the author of "The Good Earth," of Movie Picture show fame, and a number of great books dealing with Asiatic conditions. The daughter of an American Missionary, she is the best posted American writer on the Orient of our time. In 1938 she was awarded the Nobel prize for literature. Her first husband was a Professor of Nanking University, and of this marriage there are two daughters. Her present husband is Richard J. Walsh. Pearl Buck is one of the ablest and most fearless outstanding writers in the English language. —Ed.]

A vast dim shape of peoples is now beginning to appear out of this war. It is so dim that it will not be seen by all, and the last people to see it, inevitably, will be those who are in the thick of the active waging of the war, the men who are commanding the battle, at home and abroad. These are the necessary "men of action," whose minds are too busy with the day's work to see beyond it. They are essential men, we cannot do without them, and yet we must not allow all our vision to be bound by the limitations of "men of action."

For the vast shape is there. It is not a ghost—it is the first appearance of a reality. And the reality is the world of to-morrow, beginning to take shape out of the world of to-day. It is not prophecy, it is not guess, it is what is already beginning to happen.

What is this shape? It is the shape of a world in which there is already a new East. The war began in the East, not in Europe, and the primary war is being fought in the East. When peace is made, whether it is made in our time or after it, it will be made in the East.

In the East, the war began in that part which is Japan. The seizure of Manchuria in 1931 was not the beginning of the war, though some have called it that. The war was begun in Japan long before that and it was a civil war. There were no military battles, unless one wishes to call the assassination of liberal ministers of state a battle. The war was between old Japan and new Japan —"old Japan" which is the old East, of which ancient Japan was a part, and "new Japan" which is the West. For Japan, though she became a power in so spectacularly short a time, did not become westernised. Her modernisation, so far as it went, was simply the modernisation of weapons of war, of ships, of techniques, in industries and education. Japan never deserved the common accusation of being a "copy-cat of the West." Never has there been a more independent resistant people than the Japanese. Everything brought in from the West by new Japan was at tremendous cost of struggle against it. It was only with reluctance and out of the bitter necessity of coping with the West that Japan modernised herself at all. In the process, there were inevitably individuals who were influenced by Western thinking and civilisation. Against these the old Japan fought with ferocity —and now has won. It is old Japan that wages war against the West to-day, old Japan, though fighting with bombers and warships. Her civil war is finished. Her people are unified for the duration. Old Japan has triumphed and is on the offensive against the West.

This triumph of the ancient East has had its inevitable effect upon other countries of Asia. The Pan-Asia of which Japan is dreaming will not come under her rule, but it will come about. It is the clearest part of to-morrow's vast dim shape. The military triumph of Japan against the West has made Pan-Asia something more than a dream. China, fighting beside the West against Japan, nevertheless has not lost as the white man has lost in Burma, in Malaya, in the Netherland East Indies, and even in the Philippines. For in those losses the East triumphed over the West and China is part of the East. China was fighting a local war against Japan, but she was also in a larger war, and though she lost the smaller war she gained in the larger one. In so far as Japanese victory has pushed the West out of the East, it has been China's victory, too.

And it has been India's victory. When Japan drove the white man out of his empire in other places she loosened his hold upon India. The slackening of the imperial grasp is felt by millions of hearts hungry for freedom. It explains, more than anything else, what is happening at this moment in India, and what will happen tomorrow. There may be new war with new foes and strange new alliances.

For the triumph of old Japan has awakened the soul of the East, numbed with its century-and-a-half of contact with the West. That old East, the spirit of the millions of its people, has wondered at the West, has admired the brilliance of its science, has been terrified, too, by its weapons and terror. But admiration and amusement have passed now. The East has recovered itself, it has decided to revive its own life, to live as it wishes to live. The East has decided to revive its own life, to live as it wishes to live. The East has discovered that it can be free.

It is this discovery of the possibility of freedom by those who have not been free which is the most potent force in our world to-day. Great good may come out of it and great evil. For freedom is man's dream wherever man is found. The ignorant worker on a rubber plantation in Sumatra dreamed of freedom, slave that he was. The Indian in a village, never having seen an Englishman, has known he was not free, and he is hungry and thirsty for freedom, and he will have freedom though he die for it. For this war is larger than the struggle between any two or three nations, larger than our war with Hitler, larger than Japan's war of aggression, larger even than any war for national survival. It is the war for human freedom.

We peoples of the West are brave people and on the whole, honest people. But too many of us are merely men of action and as men of action, we see little and comprehend less of those things which cannot be handled or photographed or put into reports. We scorn the importance of the intangible. What we must see is that this war is not merely the active war now being fought in Europe and the Pacific. These are only the immediate thrusts of war. They are the parts of the whole upon which the spotlight is being fixed. The struggle is not contained in the spotlight.

Where is the struggle? The struggle is in the awakening peoples, all those peoples of the world, who sitting long in darkness, now rise to their feet at the sudden call of that word freedom.

In India last spring Madame Chiang Kai-shek, addressing a group of Indian women besought them to rouse their nation to the danger of the Japanese; and, to make her plea strike to their hearts as it came from her own, she told them with fearful realism of the tortures which the women and children of China suffered at the hands of the enemy. There was sympathy, there was sorrow, but at the end of the meeting an Indian got up and her voice rang over the room.

"Let no one imagine," she said clearly, "that it can make any possible difference to us whether it is the Japanese or the British who rule India."

An Englishman, a man of goodwill and integrity, hearing this was amazed, "Curiously irrelevant," he exclaimed, in telling of the incident, "in grating discord with the prevailing mood."

But he did not see the larger war and he could not understand that there comes a moment to human beings, after long endurance, when nothing is worth having if it is not freedom and nothing is more hateful than the lack of it.

It was another Englishman, Henry W. Nevinson, who said, "You know what freedom is when you have not got it." He was right—none who have always been free, can understand the terrible fascinating power of the hope of freedom, to those who are not free. But we must understand, we free peoples of the West, if we are to understand what is happening to-day in the East and why it is happening. We must not be controlled by those who are not able to understand. The Governor of Alabama, protesting against a federal contract which calls for no discrimination in labour on the grounds of colour or creed, says—

> The State of Alabama is not willing to enter any contract in which this clause appears—I regard it as extremely unfortunate that this issue should be forced upon the southern people in a time when the very life of the Nation is at stake—There should be no attack on the long-established institutions of any section when our sons are engaged in a life and death struggle with the enemies of the democratic way of life. The Democratic party of Alabama has as its motto, "white supremacy."
> —(Congressional Record, July 24, 1942).

But the peoples who are waging the larger war cry out, in answer, "How can democracy and white supremacy be spoken of in the same breath? For what do your sons die when they die for democracy, if it is not for democracy for all?"

The Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, in his address to the American people of July 23, 1942, said:—

> It has been our purpose in the past—and will remain our purpose in the future—to use the full measure of our influence to support attainment of freedom by all peoples who, by their acts, show themselves worthy of it and are ready for it.

And the peoples who are not free cry, "Who made you who are white, the judges to decide who are worthy of freedom, who ready for freedom? Is freedom something to be attained, or is it man's natural right? Have you not said yourselves that man is born free?

In spite of any efforts to limit it, this war is becoming a war for human freedom everywhere, and that is the greatest war that can be waged by humankind. The issue with Japan may be lost in it, and so may the issue with Germany. Our limited war aims of maintaining our standards of living, of preserving our sectional prejudices, of keeping the seas open, of maintaining our centres of power in the Orient, of getting back to the "status quo"—however we cling to these hopes of a limited war they are being swept from us. Peoples are taking this war out of the hands of governments and militarists. They are sweeping away the men of small minds.

What then shall we do? We may do nothing if we like except to deny the truth. It is always possible to deny the intangible, to refuse its inevitability, to cling to the limits of what is plain to the limited vision. But while we do these things we are taking great risk of losing the real war. For as we fail to express freedom—and inevitably we must fail—we will grow afraid and our fear will open the door to Hitler and to others like him. These will say, and to ready listeners, "Let all white peoples join together. We must stick together, we white people."

On the day when the white peoples agree to join together against the rest of the world, the shape in the East will spring clearly into the sight of all. We shall see it, the blindest and the most stupid of us. And Russia will be with the East, not the West, whether vanquished or victorious over Hitler now. Pan-Asia will not be a dream on that day. It will be a reality but it will not be Japan's Pan-Asia. It will be Pan-Asia, more than one-half of the world. You can see the shape, now.

If we go on as we are, taking cognisance only of the things which are happening on the battlefields, if we refuse to hear that great tocsin for Freedom that echoes in all the peoples who are not free, the day will come—it takes no prophet to declare it—when we shall have to fight for our own freedom against most fearful odds of revenge and bitterness—revenge for what is now history, and bitterness because in these days when we could all be saved, we do nothing.

For it is possible to do something. It is possible first to recognise the size of this war, to understand the power of the word Freedom and to use it. We hang back, we are afraid to speak out boldly and tell these hungering and thirsting peoples that they shall have freedom and have it now.

> "It was much, no doubt," an Englishman associated with the Cripps Mission to India says, "to ask that, having waited so long to acquire the right to determine their national destiny, the Congress leaders should have waited a little longer; but now that its acquisition was assured them immediately after the war, provided only that the United Nations won it, and in view of the practical necessities of the present situation, was it too much to ask?"

We must understand that it was too much to ask of people who fought bravely through the First World War, being under the impression, whether rightly or wrongly, given them consciously or unconsciously, that they would have the right to determine their national destiny afterward. Twenty-three years have passed, a generation in India, and they have not been given the right to determine their national destiny, the right, that is, with which every man is born. After a hundred and fifty years, and a promise, and then twenty-three years of waiting for the promise, and then another promise—whatever the western point of view, to the man in the East it was too long to wait. To do nothing, therefore, in the view of this world longing for freedom, does this mean that we are afraid of freedom for the peoples not our own, the races not our own? Do we fear a free Indian, and a free coloured man in America? The uneasy memory of what is past is in us. Revenge is human.

What we must now realise is that there is a chance for us to wipe out that past by present action. Swift and clear action now for freedom for all will make amends for the denials of freedom in the past. But it must be action and not promises of "after the war."

But when we have acted, when we have set free, so far as is in our power, the peoples of the East, need we be afraid? The white race is in the minority in the world. Need we fear the coloured peoples? I am perhaps the last person to answer the question for I cannot understand such fear. I have lived almost all my life, sometimes entirely solitary in great communities of non-white peoples, all the time nearly solitary, and I have seen nothing to fear among these peoples. They are more amiable, more laughter-loving, more kindly in personal ways, than the white peoples are. If they are not more benevolent than we are, at least they are equally so.

Our benevolence is of different kinds. I will give an example. The western man is benevolent when he makes laws for the insane which put the crippled mind or body into institutions which segregate him from the community. The man in the East considers it cruel to separate the afflicted from those most likely to give him real affection and care, his family. And again, if children are better protected from oppressive labour in the West, old people are treated far more humanely in the East. You may take your choice of benevolence, East and West, but there is no need to be afraid. There is no choice between colours and cruelty, either. East and West, Germans and Japanese, have run a neck-and-neck race in cruelty in this war.

Nothing but good to us will come out of an East that is free. Ruler and subject, governor and governed, must not be the human relations between East and West. Co-operation can be the relation, if we are willing to make it so. And we ought to give the great civilisation of the East their chance now, for they are based upon the primary importance of human relationships, a notion, strange enough to us, but which for all that, may hold the key to the future. Our own record for the last three centuries in the West is damning enough. There have been ten treaties, from the Treaty of Westphalia to the Treaty of Versailles, each to end war, each proclaiming fervently the brotherhood of man. All have failed because we would not practise what we preached.

"But it is more complex than that!" is the cry of the man who intends to do nothing. The simple necessity to-day, then, is to accept the fact that the real war is about freedom, and to declare that freedom is a natural right and that the peoples shall be free. And what is freedom? Simply that all shall be considered equal as human beings. There is to be no further subjection of peoples by peoples or races. That is what the East means by freedom. The West must mean it too.

WE NEED OUR PACIFISTS

By HAVELOCK ELLIS

(Written and published in 1938. Ellis lived 1859-1939)

I who am an old man with one foot in the grave have most of my life looked forward to the United States of the World. With that union of Mankind wars would cease and a true civilisation at last become possible. I would like once more to repeat that message which has never seemed so urgent as at this time of crisis.

The United States of Europe is the necessary step towards a wider Union. The historical phase of nationality is over. To speak any longer in terms of nationalities is to court inevitable disaster. So is also a direct fight against Fascism in defence of other principles of nationality.

When carrying on their negotiations it is time our diplomats ceased to harp upon the rights of nationalities. Czecho-Slovakia, an artificial State created by a few powerful and arrogant nations out of the chaos of the last war, is deemed to have such an individual national sanctity as to justify a world-wide war over the question of its defence or dismemberment. Germany has no more right to rule over all German-speaking people than we have to rule over all English-speaking people.

Bones of contention, Alsatian, Sudetan or other, will always exist so long as men go on thinking nationalistically. Such a country as Switzerland might well be torn to pieces between three powerful nations on account of its three different languages. Nations are among the most artificial creation of Man, totally arbitrary for the most part, for the old racial notions are now scientifically exploded.

That Europe is in a sore plight as the aftermath of nations having mistakenly jumped at each other's throat 24 years ago is no reason to continue piling catastrophe upon catastrophe in the name of a murderous gospel long out of date in the light of science and common sense. Neither is it anything but madness to blame Germans for behaving like hogs in a Europe where they have been treated like hogs after a war for which cooler judgment has long since led most thinking people to find wrongs fairly equal on both sides. Nor are hoggish dispositions so peculiar a phenomenon in Europe. He who sees the mote in his brother's eye does not see the beam in his own.

Some of us would die happier should we see the group of fellow-men to whom we belong ready to stand, even at this time of crisis, for an immediate proposal of total disarmament and an invitation to all other nations in the world to meet through their representatives, in view of promoting parallel total disarmament and of creating the United States of Europe.

No more patched-up maps of intensified nationalities, but the first draft of a new map, and the possibility of world-control of production, transport, and so on.

England seems well placed to take such a step with hope of success if its uncompromising pacifists are called forth to replace the type of worn-out and old-fashioned diplomats.

BOOK REVIEWS

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

I have read during the past few weeks four small books or pamphlets each of which, in a very different way, can provide the intelligent reader with invaluable equipment in his fight against war and the pernicious delusions which infest the minds of the majority of his fellow-citizens.

"Death Pays a Dividend," by Fenner Brockway and Frederic Mullally, 3/6, Gollanz, is an able and fully documented exposure of the disgraceful part played by the international armament firms in producing wars for their own profit. The data given are so varied and so striking that the value of the book is not seriously impaired by the fact that the authors' analysis of the root cause of the trouble—the orthodox Socialists' bogey, Capitalism—and the remedies which they suggest (which include an International Police Force) are open to considerable criticism. As I have often pointed out, it is a dangerous half-truth to say that Capitalism is the cause of modern war which is highly inimical to many forms of Capitalism. The main cause of this war is not Capitalism, but Finance, yet the book is of especial value to those monetary reformers who so often fall into the error of supposing that Finance is the only cause of modern war. Though doubtless they are the favoured protégés of financiers who assist them with loans when they refuse money to more worthy enterprises, the armament-makers, planning and fomenting wars for their own profit, constitute a phenomenon of evil quite distinct from that of the financiers trying to crush a rival system which does not make the creation and issue of money subservient to the interests of money-lending.

"Don't Be Fooled Again," by Robert J. Scrutton, published by the St. George Book Co., Ltd., 24 St. George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.1, (price not known, but probably very moderate). Mr. Scrutton's new book contains a number of extremely challenging and thought-provoking observations, in addition to being an exposition of his plan for making Democracy work. Mr. Scrutton's organisation—the People's Common Law Parliament—has many enemies and may not be above criticism, as he himself would probably be one of the first to admit. At the same time, as far as I am aware, it is the only organisation in the world, and certainly in Britain, which is endeavouring to perform a task absolutely vital if wars and misgovernment are to be prevented and poverty is to be abolished. Many people in these times of distress are looking for a "new leader," but even if a new leader, a man of wisdom, honour and principle, did arise by way of contrast to the foolish or scoundrelly politicians who occupy positions of authority in almost every country in the world, there would be no guarantee that his wise rule would survive him and that he would not one day be succeeded in office by men of the old and inferior type. P.C.L.P. has a better plan. It suggests how the electorate can be organised and trained to form a wise judgment on important issues, local, national and international. It shows how the people can use the powers which they already possess, but of which most of them are ignorant, and, most important of all, it shows how they can, and should, direct and control the men whom their ignorance and apathy have allowed to become, not their servants, but their masters. P.C.L.P. has done more than merely make suggestions with regard to how true Democracy should function. In certain places it has actually got going and it has begun to secure definite results, and even if it does not provide everyone with a satisfactory answer to the common question, "What can we do?" it at leeast puts them well in the way of making their own experiments to discover the right answer for themselves.

"The Truth about Pearl Harbour," by John T. Flynn; 15E, 44th Street, New York City. This American pamphlet, very fully documented, contains the most thorough exposure I have yet read of the war-mongering duplicity of President Roosevelt's foreign policy. Having given a pledge to his people that he would not involve their country in war, yet being himself desperately anxious to do so, he lacked the courage and honesty to lay the whole matter and his feeling about it before the American nation and to resign if, after doing so and hearing his views, the majority would not support him. He therefore set himself, by every means he could devise, to goad the Axis Powers into a declaration of war on the U.S.A., these methods being carefully concealed by propaganda. The early part of the pamphlet contains a few interesting examples of the tactics employed in the case of Germany, but, as the title implies, the greater part of it is devoted to the tactics employed against Japan. I was already aware from information received from other American sources that Japan was perfectly willing to explore the possibility of arriving at a friendly settlement, but I had no idea as to what tremendous concessions, including the conclusion of peace with China and the withdrawal of nearly all Japanese forces sent in from 1937. Japan was willing to make. Roosevelt, however, it appears, had not the slightest desire for peace with Japan on any reasonable terms. He wanted war and was confident of an easy victory. He continued to pursue a policy which ended with a presentation to Japan of an ultimatum of so drastic a character as he well knew would make war inevitable. The pamphlet, however, clearly indicates that the President's skill in getting his country involved in war was by no means matched by his ability to conduct the war successfully in its early stages. By grossly under-estimating the strength of Japan and miscalculating the locality where the first attack would take place, he involved the U.S.A. in extremely heavy losses, but an attempt was made to conceal the blunder by putting the blame on Admiral Kimmel, Commander of the Pacific Fleet, and General Short, Commander of the army at Hawaii. These officers were relieved of their commands and ordered to remain silent pending Court-Martial, while Washington proceeded to create the impression that it would be harmful to the national safety even to discuss the subject during the war. It would appear, however, from the interesting data supplied by Mr. Flynn, that Admiral Kimmel and General Short were in no way to blame for the disaster at Pearl Harbour and did all that they could reasonably have been expected to do.

"Press Parade," by Hamilton Fyfe, published by Watts & Co., 1/6, is not a new book, and readers of The Word may have difficulty in obtaining copies unless it be through a public library, or through a dealer in second-hand books. Its interest lies in its author's devastating and interesting exposure of the kind of men who control our main propaganda agencies and the kind of methods which are employed. There can be little chance of a brave new world unless the people learn to distrust utterly and completely the organs of the Daily Press as long as their present ownership and control remain unchanged.

Consider how "Communists" boast of the bloc vote in the Trades Unions to-day, and how the capitalist press boosts Pollitt's war propaganda from time to time, and then read these extracts from Pollitt's second speech in this debate (pages 17-21):

The strikes of the future can only be led by the workers developing their own leadership and organisation in complete defiance of the bureaucracy which controls the Trade Union Movement to-day.

Comrades, the Labour Party and I.L.P. are not lesser evils. They put forward this theory of the lesser evil to hold the masses back. The capitalist papers deliberately manufacture left wing Socialist heroes and make them national figures, to act as a barrier to the leftward moving masses, and preventing them joining the Communists, and retarding the growth of the Communist Party.

I speak in the name of our Party, conscious of the fundamental difference in principles which characterises the I.L.P. and the Communist Party. So far as coming together as the crisis deepens—we say in all seriousness that the principles for which the I.L.P. stand represent not a lesser evil for the working class, but an opportunist poisoning and a foul corruption of the workers' movement which it is our job to drive out of the working class.

Pollitt's third speech was a summary (pages 26-28).

Here is Pollitt's peroration:

Give your reply, not by speeches of unity, a false unity—(loud applause)—but by joining the Communist Party—(loud and prolonged applause)—and strengthening the Communist International, the leader of the World Revolution, and the freedom of the toiling millions of every country.

And where is the Communist International to-day? And what of that long and prolonged applause?

And here is Pollitt's glib and utterly false reply to a question (page 31):

Question to Pollitt: What is the Communist Party's attitude to pacifism?

Answer: The Communist Party believes that the advocacy of pacifism is the advocacy of principles of belief that more than anything else disorganise and disintegrate the workers' fight against capitalism. I can admire and understand the spirit which dominates some men to go to prison as conscientious objectors rather than take up arms in a capitalist war, but I believe that they are fundamentally wrong, and the Communist Party's attitude on this question is as follows: that those who are compelled to take up arms shall utilise that situation for the purpose of doing everything they possibly can to win support for the revolution and the turning of an imperialist war into a civil war by the widest number of workers possible, and that those who are in industry shall do everything that is humanly possible, by strikes and by sabotage to bring about, in conjunction with their comrades in the army, the defeat of their own country. With such a belief pacifism has no place and the advocacy of general pacifist beliefs and "No More War" propaganda is simply playing the fool with a serious situation.

Ask yourself: Is this man who puts their case forward in debate with Brockway, and made this answer to a question on war and pacifism, and now pleads for unity with the Labour Party, not one of the meanest and most contemptible time-serving political knaves of our time?

Of course, Willie Gallacher, M.P., follows him very closely. Let all genuine enquirers read chapter XVI of our work on Socialism and Parliament, Part I, dealing with "Communist Parliamentarism." Note the desire to exploit the Irish Catholic vote at Merthyr in 1934 by the "Communists." Read Gallacher's attack on "the wriggling" of Neil Maclean in 1921. (In one place an error makes the date January 20, 1941, when it should read 1921). Study Gallacher's "Communist" wrigglings on the subject of parliamentarism and how he won West Fife from Adamson, the Miner's Leader, in 1935. Now sitting for Fife, he wants Labour Party support. What a game! What a dirty game! And the "Communists" are prepared to get workers jailed, beaten-up on the streets, conscripted into war, made victims of violent strikes from left or right, so long as they can get into power.

The Manchester Guardian, for December 2, 1929, reported a speech made by Harry Pollitt at a Communist Party meeting:

Only through social revolution, only through armed insurrection, can the workers gain power.

The Workers' Life, December 9, 1929, published a report of a speech delivered by Willie Gallacher. He said:

They had talked of a Revolutionary Workers' Government, but did they realise what was implied? Would the organisation of the workers for the revolutionary government be a legal one? The task of fighting for a revolutionary government would be a task of bringing the workers out on to the streets against the armed forces of Capitalism.

The inaugural Conference of the C.P. voted by a small majority (100 to 85) in favour of seeking affiliation with the Labour Party.—Communist, August 5, 1920.

In 1921 the C.P. opposed the Labour Party's parliamentary candidates, the late J. R. MacDonald at Woolwich, and Morgan Jones at Caerphilly.—Communist, August 20, 1921.

In 1922, preaching the policy of the "United Front," the Communists gave "conditional" support to Labour Party candidates at the General Election, Communist, October 28, 1922. They pledged themselves, if accepted into the Labour Party, "to conform to the constitution," subject to the right of criticism of policy or tactics "in common with all affiliated bodies." Communist, June 10, 1922. In 1922 they supported Mr. MacDonald at Aberavon.

In the 1923 General Election "Communists" gave unconditional support to the Labour Party candidates. Workers Weekly, December 7, 1923. They did the same in 1924. Workers Weekly, October 17, 1924.

Late in 1926, after the General Strike, they still supported Labour candidates, "even if the latter are Right Wingers," and including an ex-Liberal, Commander Kenworthy, who still proclaimed his faith in Liberalism. See Communism is Commonsense. C.P.G.B. pamphlet published in July, 1926, and a Hull Election Leaflet issued by the Communists in November, 1926.

In 1928, Communist Review, February, 1928, Communists were still prepared to support all the Labour candidates. Moscow intervened and ordered a complete reversal of policy. Workers Weekly, February 24, 1928.

At the 1929 General Election they were willing to support Labour candidates who would accept certain "minimum working-class demands." Sunday Worker, April 14, 1929.

In 1938 and 1939 the official policy of the Communist Party was to support Labour candidates, but also to press for a Popular Front Government. On March 30, 1939, the Daily Worker published the following in bold headlines:

Communist Appeal to Attlee, Sinclair and Churchill—Urged to Defeat Cabinet and Form New Government.

It added:

In a swift and sensational move to get practical action to save the country in the rapidly deepening crisis, Harry Pollitt, on behalf of the Communist Party of Great Britain, yesterday addressed to Major Attlee, leader of the Parliamentary Labour Party, Sir Archibald Sinclair, leader of the Liberal Party, and Mr. Winston Churchill, most prominent of the Conservative "rebels" an appeal that they shall "get together without another minute's delay."

Six months later when war broke out this was still the Communist policy, put forward with even greater insistence than before, since the Communist Party officially and wholeheartedly supported the war and urged the removal of the existing Government in order to make the prosecution of war more effective.

A month later, because the Russian Government late in August, 1939, made a pact of friendship and non-intervention with Hitler, the Communist Party decided to oppose the war. It explained that the earlier action of supporting it had been due to a failure to appreciate its imperialist nature. H. Pollitt and others made abject confessions of error.

In May, 1940, Attlee and Sir Archibald Sinclair actually joined the Churchill Government, thus carrying out what the Communists had urged in March of the previous year. The Labour Party, instead of receiving Communist blessing, was denounced in the Daily Worker, May 10, 1940, for associating with Churchill.

What a man to take under the wing of the Labour Party!

The workers were now urged to "fight against Labour participation in Churchill's new Government." Daily Worker, May 11, 1940.

In June, 1941, when Germany attacked Russia, the Communists reversed their policy and supported the war and the Churchill Government.

William Pearson impertinently asserts that the Communist Party can be trusted! With what?

OUR LETTER-BOX

LETTER BOX.

Dear Comrade,—May I draw your attention to two errors of fact, the one of minor importance only and the other considerably more dangerous, occurring in your editorial review of "Workers in Stalin's Russia," by M. L. Berneri, the first part of which was published in "The Word," Vol. VI, No. 6 (January, 1945)?

On page 63, in column 1, you relate: "On October 1, the Moscow Soviet elected a Bolshevik majority. A week later, Trotsky, regarded as a Bolshevik and acting as such in the closest alliance, was elected President of the Petrograd Soviet."

I would point out that in point of fact Trotsky, Lunarcharsky, Uritsky, Riazanov and their followers in the Mezhrayontsi, or Inter-District Organisation, were admitted into the ranks of the Bolsheviks at the August, 1917 (July, old style) Congress of that Party. Trotsky and Lunacharsky were arrested on August 12 (July 23) on similar charges to those made against Lenin and Zinoviev, the warrant for whose arrest was issued on August 10 (July 21). In October Trotsky was not merely regarded as a Bolshevik": he was one.

On the same page and in the same column you make a theoretical assertion unfounded on fact and therefore open to argument. "The Bolsheviks," you state, "by their uncompromising stand for Zimmerwald Pacifism, became the one party in Russia." I find it hard to imagine a more dangerous half-truth; for in your article you make no attempt to differentiate between the Right and Left Wings at Zimmerwald. The Right Wing, the "social-pacifists," as Lenin termed them, were mere muddle-headed emotionalists sucked from the salons of an indecisive centrism, the revolutionary content of whose internationalism had been long since emasculated by their prolonged flirtation with bourgeois-radical, humanistic, non-bloodletting Pacifists, who condemned the class war as strongly as they condemned war between nations. Lenin was the champion of the minority at Zimmerwald, the Zimmerwald Left, in whose policy and personnel was to be found the nucleus of the Third International. You state that on war issues you "stand with Lenin": if, however, you imagine that Lenin would have approved your all-out, uncritical and completely comradely alliance with men of the type of Rhys Davies and the Duke of Bedford, I suggest you re-read the works of Lenin. In so far as you oppose the cancer of Stalinism, more power to your elbow; in so far as you continue to dally with the day-dreams of an anachronistic anarchism, may you be damned.

Yours fraternally,

JOHN C. FAIRHEAD.

NOTES AND COMMENTS
BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

In an article which I read recently, a certain monetary reform organisation, which it would be unkind to name, but which until comparatively recently has been conspicuous for its exclusiveness and its hearty desire to destroy all rivals, is reported as having allied itself with another organisation with the aim of promoting a desirable common objective in the interests of individual freedom. The writer of the article wisely praises this growing tendency to co-operate. It is, indeed, both tragic and disgraceful that the various monetary reform movements and peace movements should be divided to the extent they are by jealousy, exclusiveness, suspicion and a total inability to realise that it is possible and often necessary for individuals and organisations who cannot see eye to eye on a number of issues to combine in the promotion of one until the aim in question has been achieved. Such temporary alliances need not involve any sacrifice of principle whatever, and they may make the whole difference between success and failure. Another aspect of this disunity was emphasised recently in a correspondence I had with a friend about a third person who is the object of much criticism, a good deal of which, at any rate, is, I fancy, undeserved. In the course of this correspondence I had occasion to remind my friend of the frequency with which I had been warned by diverse well-meaning persons against him, and he in his reply amused, but did not greatly surprise me, by referring to the number of occasions on which he had been warned against me, adding that these warnings are characteristic of reform movements! My friend is perfectly right, but I cannot help feeling that reform movements would achieve a great deal more if their members were not quite so keen on warning people against each other and were a bit more ready to co-operate in getting on with the job. Warnings, alas! are sometimes necessary, but too often they spring from minds inclined to a narrow outlook and an uncharitable judgment which bases its conclusions on wholly inadequate data.

When reading the other day a pamphlet by one of our more progressive economists, I was surprised to find, in view of the statements which are continually being made of Britain's dependence on imports, that the import and export trade in relation to the total production and business of the country, was in normal times only about ten per cent. I therefore consulted the Secretary of the Economic Reform Club who found that the figure, though an under-estimate, was a comparatively small one, the correct figures for the years 1936, 1937 and 1938 being somewhere in the region of fifteen per cent. It would appear, therefore, that in spite of our large population, the difficulty in making ourselves self-supporting in respect of goods not of a tropical origin, is not so serious as might be imagined. It is also clear evidence that the Government's undue pre-occupation with the post-war export trade is not justified and one may suspect that financial interests and not the interests of the country as a whole are behind it.

A correspondent tells me that he is informed that certain Masons are quitting Masonry in not inconsiderable numbers. I have never myself made a very careful examination of the Masonic question, but, as some readers of The Word will be aware, there are a certain number of people, some of them by no means unintelligent, who are convinced that the higher ranks of Masonry are controlled by very anti-social influences, of the nature of which the rank and file are for the most part unaware. Whether this view be justified or not, it seems certain that Continental Masonry—with which, it is only fair to add, British Masonry claims to have no connection—has often come under exceedingly evil influences, and I have heard stories from an eye-witness of some of the practices of the Grand Orient which can only be described as blood-curdling.

Peace News of January 19th records the unpleasant fact that the War Office forbade a number of German wounded to have any Christmas celebrations, although decorations and extra food were available and a number of German nurses on the hospital staff had arranged to sing carols to the wounded men. This exhibition of petty spite, lack of sportsmanship, or stupid red tape is matched by an announcement said to have been made by General Eisenhower that, as, and when, the Allies occupy Germany, churches will be permitted to reopen but they must keep out of politics. Anyone possessing an elementary knowledge of true religion is, of course, aware that Christianity must enter into every department of life and especially into a person's politics, as these so largely affect the welfare of his fellow-men and the success with which he can perform his duty to his neighbour. It was one of Hitler's most outstanding mistakes that he thought that religion could, and should, be kept in a water-tight compartment outside of politics, but he had considerably more excuse for his error than General Eisenhower, who comes from a land which has produced men of the spiritual calibre of Dr. Fosdick and Dr. Mott.

Another example of American military piety is provided by a prayer card which, according to the Manchester Guardian, has been issued by General Patton, who commands the United States Third Army. The prayer contains the following passages:—"Almighty and most merciful Father, we humbly beseech thee of Thy great goodness to restrain these immoderate rains with which we have had to contend. Grant us fair weather for battle." Christian readers of The Word will not need to be reminded that the only prayers of petition which have the remotest chance of being answered are those which are in "Christ's name," i.e., of the same kind that Our Lord would have offered if He had been in the place of the author or user of the prayer.

Further evidence of General Patton's qualifications as a writer of Christian prayers is provided by the expression of his opinions in the American publication Life.

> "The way to fight Germans is to ram a bayonet into their belly buttons and rip 'em up and down . . . All you have to do with these Huns is to drive them up one hill and kick them down another all the way to Berlin."

From the Daily Mail of 1/2/45:—

> "Nothing can now stop us—we will soon be in Berlin. We are thirsting with the desire to see the Germans weeping and crying, screaming and howling, suffering hell and dying," said the Moscow Radio last night.
> "The hour of retribution has come and the German people are already in convulsions—they are already stewing in their own juice" continued Moscow.
> "There can be no mercy, no pity. We will see that Berlin pays for this."

That's the way to make the workers of the world unite and set an example to quarrelling "Christian" nations!

I was considerably surprised recently to receive a letter from a soldier correspondent in Belgium, who is an aviculturist, who told me that birds of the parrot family, coming from three different continents, are still fairly easy to buy in the country and that proper parrot food, including millet and canary seed, the price of which in this country is almost above rubies, is quite easy to obtain. This news comes somewhat strangely from a country which is supposed to have been groaning under the heel of German misrule. A starving and oppressed people have usually neither the heart, the money, nor the facilities for tragedies of war has been the havoc wrought country, are the dealers able to supply them with the proper food. In Britain one of the minor trageedies of war has been the havoc wrought in the interesting hobby of bird-keeping which, intelligently and humanely conducted, can provide a delightful interest and relaxation, in the common enjoyment of which people of all classes can share and sometimes begin new friendships. Before the war there were in this country a great number of curious or beautiful breeds of domestic pigeons, fowls, canaries, etc., which were the product of years of careful thought and selection. The little budgerigar, comparatively recently domesticated, was appearing in an increasing number of new and beautiful colours. Fanciers with more means were engaged in preserving, by breeding them in captivity, rare and lovely foreign birds threatened with extinction in a wild state. Now, after more than five years' war-madness, little, I fear, can be left but animals of a purely utilitarian value and many of the fancy breeds and species must have vanished, in some cases for good, owing to lack of food and to owners being called up. Anti-war fanciers deserve much sympathy in the loss of their pets. Those who are pro-war are reaping but one instalment of the results of their own and their leaders' folly; other instalments are likely soon to follow outside the realm of bird-keeping.

Mr. Colin Darby, Senior Deputy Director of the Supply Ministry's Home Timber Production Department, is reported recently to have said that over one-hundred-million trees have been felled in Britain since the beginning of the war. (I am tempted to feel that a considerable portion of this handsome total has been compulsorily requisitioned from my own estate, and I dare say that there are a good many other people who feel much the same about theirs)!

Mr. Darby added that the outlook for the home-grown trade after the war was not a pleasant one. "But it was better for us to have cut our own throats than to have allowed the Germans to do it." What a typical Government spokesman's remark! "This animal is very vicious," as the Frenchman said, "when attacked it defends itself." We attacked Germany in defence of Poland, which, at the finish, we have entirely failed to defend; we resolutely rejected every suggestion for an honourable peace by negotiation; and then Mr. Darby mentions that we have squandered our timber resources in protecting ourselves against the wanton attack of a savage foe!

TO THE CONSCRIPTING FATHERS OF THE HILLS.

From "The Boise Valley Herald."

We are the failures of peacetime,
  Reliefers and W.P.A.
Our eyes have grown weary with watching
  For dawn of a happier day;
So if you need victims to Moloch,
  If you must have mantargets for guns,
If you have to send troopers to Britain,
  Send us there instead of our sons!

We left our own youth in the Argonne,
  We buried our strength in the Meuse,
We knew the red fields around Soissons,
  And remember the Marne—with a curse.
We envy our comrades who fell there
  To make the world safe—for the Huns,
We're veterans, trained in the fighting,
  Let us die instead of our sons!

We came back, the lorn and forgotten,
  We never again found the place
We lost by our years in the service,
  We had to fall back in the race.
You gave us your doles for subsistence
  When we asked you for ways to earn bread;
Now give us the last boon of freemen,
  Let us be the doomed and the dead!

You have wasted our years and our manhood,
  You have frittered us down to our doom,
And, then, having failed with our freedom,
  You are ready to save it—for whom?
So now, for the sake of our children,
  If you must send the fodder for guns,
Send men whom you've crushed into paupers,
  Let us die instead of our sons!

A VILLAGE EDITOR

Reference was made in these columns for September 1944, to the Boise Valley Herald, edited by our comrade, A. Cornell.

In its issue for October 26, 1944, our contemporary, in its 19th continuous instalment, concluded the series of essays from the Duke of Bedford's pen that it had published under the general heading , "Why Keep Blundering On?"

For the purpose of comment, the editor grouped the three booklets under one general head. The first of the booklets by our contemporary was Peace and Reconstruction, the speech that the Duke of Bedford had made in the House of Lords on June 2nd, 1942. The second was Straight Speaking to a Militarist from a Pacifist, and included the issues of July 13th through August 24th. The third was Why Blunder On?

On November 16, 1944, the Boise Valley Herald reproduced The Duke of Bedford's leaflet, Where Have We Got To?

Summarising the import of Why Blunder On? in his leader on October 26, 1944, Editor A. Cornell writes :—

In answering the question "Why Blunder On?" the Duke of Bedford makes no pretence at offering a system that will be a complete Utopia but endeavours to offer that which, if adopted, will be a truly safe first-step forward. Although he does not say so, Bedford no doubt knows that what he is proposing is dynamic enough that the powers that rule will submit to the changes suggested only when and if they see they are powerless to halt and frustrate—and we use the term "frustrate" advisedly for when rulers are faced with an awakened and determined people, their strategy is to "manufacture" "inevitabilities"—as they have done in precipitating America into three wars, in our own lifetime—to which the common people, habitually are easy victims and suffering victims, too.

But what we have in mind here is to give what emphasis we can to Bedford's comments on the freedom of the Press.

In the measure that the Press as a part or as a whole, while pretending to be "free" is subservient to sordid standards, and commercial interests, its fruits are the exact opposite to the fruits of a Press that is free in fact as well as in name. This is to say that instead of nourishing and promoting human progress, such a Press sabotages human progress. As Bedford points out, an accusation, an attack, may be made in good faith or it may be made fraudulently. Every fraud wears the mask of piety. Because of the essential help that a publication gets via the mail service, society is vitally interested in whether or not a published statement is made in good faith or as a deceptive and sordid design. Within the limits of the space it occupies it is seldom that a statement with more profound civic and human implications is ever made than is couched in Bedford's paragraphs 113 to 122, inclusive.

In his issue for August 24, 1944, Cornell wrote :—

This is the ninth issue of this paper in which the Duke-of-Bedford comment has appeared . . . We are publishing these Bedford articles because they are from the pen of a man of character, because only a person of high character will face war hysteria such as Bedford faces. . . . This is a period in which totalitarian fuehrers and their stooges are red eyed after the few who exercise their civic rights.

In his issue for July 20, 1944, Editor Cornell recalled his refusal to regiment "to win the war against the depression under the famous emblem of the 'blue eagle'," but "exercised his right as an American citizen to caricature that hallowed bird and the great fuehrer who was dealing and doping that reign of ballyhoo out as a remedy" for economic and industrial ills.

Cornell adds that the "nationally ballyhooed plan did not fail" because he, as one village editor in one lone Idaho paper caricatured it and its hallowed bird. But he did happen "to have enough understanding" not to be "fooled nor cowed nor otherwise made to stand hitched." In this spirit he justifies the reproduction of the Duke of Bedford's comments.

We quote Cornell's leader in part :—

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD TOUCHES THE SPOT

Looked at from the viewpoint of the ordinary person, it would seem that an Idaho Village editor is going far afield to give such extended space to the comments of a member of the British House of Lords, at a time when so much is being said and done close at home, as we are devoting to the comments of the Duke of Bedford. We have no fear, however, that the thoughtful reader will come to see that, from the standpoint of this paper's opposition to violence as a course of procedure in either abating a misunderstanding or solving social problems, that there is more reason than madness in the course we are pursuing. . . .

There never was official power that was not bowed and kowtowed to by the wise and the prudent.

The Duke of Bedford makes timely comment on this crisis from various angles but he especially touches the spot in which the truly Big Boys of the world are interested, when he says the big objective of this war is to put the Axis back on the debt-making, interest-exacting money standard. That is the thing that above all else puts the spot light on the demand for "unconditional surrender." It is truly fortunate for the whole world that the British House of Lords has a member who is putting emphasis on this particular point. We wonder how many of Candidate Roosevelt's men Fridays can make an alibi for the part he has played in the international money-manipulating racket?

A. CORNELL
(Editor, "Boise Valley Herald," Idaho, U.S.A.

IRVING W. CORNELL.

BOYD B. CORNELL.

A Socialist Anti-Militarist Editor and two of his Anti-War sons.

Cornell directs attention to the Duke's citation of Fenner Brockway's depicture of the need to organise a system of international exchange, and comments that the Duke of Bedford is "proposing a most revolutionary departure from all past and present policies." Cornell heads this comment with the question: "Can Enlightened Politics Be Adopted?"

The Duke of Bedford's friendly reference to Fenner Brockway reminds Cornell that Edward Holton James refers to Brockway in his "I Tell Everything" series of factual articles on India that James published originally in Switzerland in 1931. James wrote a magnificent book, Trial Before Pilate. He is also the author of Crossroads in Europe and Jesus for the Jews.

"I Tell Everything began in the Boise Valley Herald on Thursday, April 29, 1943, and gave way to the Bedford articles. This is a curious fact since James first became acquainted with us following our trial for Indian sedition in 1909. At that time he knew Shyamaji Krishnavarma and was resident in Paris and entered into correspondence with the late Sir Walter Strickland, B.A., who knew all the leading Indian Nationalists and was most intimate with Krishnavarma.

James went to India to investigate conditions because Viscount Simon, then Sir John Simon, declared that America needed a more realistic understanding of Indian conditions.

From September 3, 1942, down to March 2, 1943, the 2nd class matter privilege enjoyed by the Boise Valley Herald was revoked by U.S. Postmaster-General Frank Walker on the charge of sedition—opposition to World War II.

On Thursday, September 3, 1942 United States Postmaster-General Walker charged, in a statement at Washington, that the Boise Valley Herald had printed matter held by the Post Office and Justice Departments to be seditious ,and stated that he had ordered the publishers to show cause, under the Espionage Act, why their second-class mail privilege should not be revoked. Walker added that he had ordered the postmaster at Middleton not to accept any copies of the Boise Valley Herald for mail until the department in Washington had ruled on their mailability.

The Postmaster-General acted on the recommendation of Attorney-General Biddle. In a letter to Walker, the latter said :—

"Basically oriented in opposition to all wars on religious and moral grounds, this publication, nevertheless, in my opinion, has exceeded the permissible limits of free speech. It has engaged over a period of time in a sustained and comprehensive attack upon the participation of the United States in the present war."

The Boise Valley Herald, continued the Attorney-General, had

"labelled the selective service act obscene and unconstitutional and applauded those who refused to comply with it."

In a press interview, members of the U.S. Attorney's office stated that A. Cornell, of Middleton, editor and publisher of the Boise Valley Herald, was father of Boyd and Clark Cornell, who served nine months in the Federal Prison Camp at Kooskia, for violation of the Selective Service Act of 1940. They recalled that Cornell senior appeared at the trial of his sons in 1941. What else did these State Attorneys expect a father to do?

The Attorney-General explained to the press :

"Since December 7, 1941, this publication, the "Boise Valley Herald" has expressed sympathy for the Japanese and their aims and objectives, blaming the aggressor nations less than the United States for the attack on Pearl Harbor."

Since proceedings were pending, according to his own statement, and that of the Postmaster-General, the Attorney-General had no right, either personally or through the medium of his assistants, to make these statements to the press. Further, they were not true.

The Idaho Daily Statesman, polling opinion in the wake of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbour, sought the opinion of A. Cornell. This journal published his reserved, mild, but clear statement of view in its issue for December 7, 1941. It was as follows :—

"I don't approve of the way our leaders have been handling the situation. If handled differently, this thing would not have happened. I would not be in favour of declaring war until all the facts are in and the provocation behind Japan's act is fully understood.

In response to the same enquiry, Irving Cornell, also connected with the Boise Valley Herald, said :—

Both nations have been fostering the war spirt so long that it is hard to go any other way, but I should not favour a declaration of war even now. We ought to remember and respect Japan's right in the Pacific . . .

The Postmaster-General only served the notice on our comrade Cornell on Monday, September 7, 1942, after the press had been informed of his action.

Postmaster George West delivered the registered package from the Assistant Postmaster-General of Washington, D.C., at the Boise Valley Herald printing office.

The indictment consisted of 117 typewritten pages, made up of quotations from every issue of the Boise Valley Herald beginning with January 15, 1942, and concluding with August 20, 1942.

The cited matter was alleged to be seditious and was written by 23 persons, all of whom were named. Twelve of the pilloried writers were said to have written one-seditious article; 5 wrote two; one wrote four; another one, six; and another, eight. This was highest, except for A. Cornell himself. He was accused of writing fifty-nine seditious articles.

Cornell replied to this complaint in typical, fearless fashion. He summarised the indictment in the Boise Valley Herald, under the excellent title, "Rogues' Gallery—Revised to August 20." He listed the names of the offending writers and published the photographs of several. He then commented on the libelled matter in the following fearless, truly democratic fashion, thereby maintaining the best traditions of the immortal Richard Carlile and Thomas Jefferson :—

"This matter as cited as seditious, if published in pamphlet form, will be valuable to writers who wish to avoid the pains and penalties of the law, as a hand-book of forms of what 'not' to write for publication, valuable alike for editors and writers. If there are enough orders come in at 10c. each to justify publication in pamphlet form, an effort will be made to publish a handy pamphlet edition of them. Do not send the pay; merely a postcard, stating how many pamphlets you will take, in case the edition happens to be published."

In a nation-wide statement to the press, Comrade Cornell quoted the definition of a newspaper published by Jos. Pulitzer, one-time editor and publisher of the New York World. This classic definition was reproduced in our columns for September 1944, Vol. VI., No. 2, page 23.

Cornell added :—

As publishers of the "Boise Valley Herald," the Cornell family have adhered to the editorial standards of Journalism as once so tellingly set forth by Joseph Pulitzer, editor and publisher of the "New York World." . . .

This ideal cannot be followed by making it secondary to commercial interests, or to political or social advancement. Since the Bill of Rights was not predicated either upon making men commercially prosperous or upon insuring that those in positions of official power should be preserved from the publicly expressed opinions of the common citizen, it is sure to become a dead letter in the exact measure that the ideal is made secondary to the sordid aims —and every aim is sordid to the degree it suppresses an ideal—implied by Mr. Pulitzer's brief statement.

The Bill of Rights must be preserved, in the same way it was gained, not by winning military victories that add to the power of those in positions to award patronage favours, but by the struggle and devotion of those who had the toughness of spirit to stand with the minority; and take punishment with the few rather than to be submissive to the lures either of easy money or of obscene preferment, or even to the threat of bodily harm.

In a very bold air-letter to the American Civil Liberties Union, New York City, Cornell defined his position with clarity. Commenting on Attorney-General Biddle's complaint, "exceeded the limits of free speech," our fellow-editor said :—

A splendid topic for an editorial, this, allowing the public servant to put a limit on the "free speech" of the citizen master.

Cornell concluded :—

In following our journalistic course, we have been a thorn in the side of local officials (public servants) and now it happens to be national officials (public servants). In one's weaker moments he is tempted to trim and appease and thus inflate obscene power. In my opinion, the aggregate of this very thing is the key of our present national crisis. To reverse that key, and put the civic conscience—of the master —at work frustrating the expediency of the servant, requires toughness of spirit in those who are the spear-head—and every community should have a spear-head—but there is no village in the nation that is under greater obligation for its paper to do its part in reversing the key and saving America, in the only way America will ever be saved, than is Middleton, Idaho. Any war whose winning depends upon the summary blacking out of the instruments of nonconformist expression will make a mighty bad smudge on the pages of our national history.

The Attorney-General's indictment of our comrade, A. Cornell, for attending the Federal Court at Boise when his sons were charged and convicted for resisting registration as conscripts, and his reference to their nine months' imprisonment for this offence, serves to recall their stand.

Tuesday, November 26, 1940, Deputy United States Marshal, E. F. Prater, came down from Boise with a warrant for the arrest of Clark M. Cornell and Boyd B. Cornell, brothers, for refusing to register as per the requirements of the Selective Service (Conscription) Act on October 16th, or subsequently.

The two prisoners were released on bond (750 dollars each) that same day. They appeared in Court for arraignment on Thursday, November 28, the arraignment was put off until Monday, December 2.

The indictment was returned November 7 by the Federal grand jury sitting at Moscow, Idaho, on evidence supplied by Middleton's registrar, Mrs. Eiffel Shaffer and Sheriff A. A. Moline.

Clark and Boyd Cornell were 30 years of age and 24, respectively, at the time of their indictment. Clark was married and had a son. He operated a farm near Middleton. Boyd assisted his father in the publishing of the Boise Valley Herald.

On Saturday, December 7, 1940, at 10 a.m., the brothers pleaded "not guilty" in the Federal District Court at Boise to charges of failure to register, after Judge C.C. Cavannah had overruled their motions to quash the indictment, on the ground that it was a peace-time encroachment on war-time powers.

In his opinion, denying the motion to quash the indictment, Judge Cavannah stated that, "prior to the middle of the 18th century, a declaration of war was necessary" to create the emergency that gave Congress the power to compel military service of a citizen in case of need, "but since, the formal declarations of war have fallen into disuse." The necessary emergency could exist now, in peace-time.

Which is a sorry picture of progressive civilisation.

Judge Cavannah's opinion was in line with the decision given by the Supreme Court, January 7, 1918, approving the Conscription Act passed in 1917.

Monday, February 10, 1941, a jury was selected to try Boyd B. Cornell in the Federal Court House at Boise; and next day, another jury was selected to try Clark M. Cornell. The charge was the same in both instances: refusing to register in land and naval forces of the United States. A verdict of guilty was returned in both instances.

After their conviction, but pending sentence, the Cornells issued a statement to the press in which they said :—

Our conviction by Federal Court has not changed our minds about our resistance to the draft act. We disobeyed it because it was born as a war measure and to-day we can see still better that it was designed to prepare us for a foreign war. And we oppose and hate war—there is no guilt in having a different opinion from the official set-up. Our desire for a jury trial was not to prove our lack of guilt, but to have a public trial of the conscription law, itself.

Writing in the Boise Valley Herald for Thursday, February 13, 1941, whilst awaiting sentence, Boyd Clark boldly wrote as follows :—

This is more or less a farewell letter to friends of my brother Clark and myself. But in the meantime I wish they would remember this:—

We are of a generation which is inheriting the hates and prejudices of times and events of the past; we are inheriting the war, the unbearable debt, the poverty of a defunct capitalistic economy.

But with all this we are also inheriting the hopes of the future, the almost unbelievable possibilities of modern science and invention; and above all the philosophy of PRODUCTION FOR USE and not for profit, which put into force would avail the workers of the world a standard of living and culture higher than they can at present imagine.

What I am getting at is this:—The young men and women of our generation and of generations to come are the one hope. We have all to gain and nothing to lose. I won't believe that our highest service to our fellow man is in the role of killer. I have too many friends of foreign birth or parentage to believe that the workers of all lands, by co-operation, would not be more useful to each other alive than dead; and I for one refuse to be a party to murder—deliberate and ruthless—to guarantee special privilege and the right to exploit to any group. And so I ask my frinds who see merit in this reasoning to talk it, read it, write it at every opportunity.

I, Boyd Cornell, have been found guilty of feloniously refusing to register in the land and naval forces of the United States as provided for by the so-called Selective Service and Training Act (Conscription) of 1940.

While the law as to legal composition may be unassailable and defy attack from accepted legal interpretation, it nevertheless is one of the most vicious attacks on human rights and liberties ever forced into the statute books of any governing body.

To refute the charge of felonious intent on my part, I believe I have only to prove that I gambled and at the greatest kind of odds, too, my freedom, my rights as a citizen and placed in jeopardy what little property I have been able to accumulate as a protest against the ruthless and arbitrary forces of what is becoming increasingly apparent from day to day is a dictatorship of entrenched wealth to fortify its position and retain its license to exploit natural resources and the inherent wealth of labour. In the United States this power is seized in the name of defense; in the so-called aggressor nations, it is justified by like forces as the "right to live." Wherever it is found it is "Fascism." It is the attempt of special privileged ones now in control of governments everywhere to make the individual the servant of the state rather than the state the servant of the individual to guarantee all men their inalienable rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and which as rights are dependent upon the conscience of the individual.

Editor A. Cornell answered the Governmental withdrawal of 2nd class mailing privileges by publishing at top of each issue of his paper the first Amendment to the Constitution, and an excerpt from the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Milligan case, 4 Wall 2 (1866).

Amendment I—Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the Press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the government for redress of grievances

The Supreme Court ruling in the Milligan case was :—

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, EQUALLY in WAR and PEACE, and covers with its shield of protection all classes of men, at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by wit of man than any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy and despotism. But the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the government within the Constitution has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence.

For ninety days, Editor Cornell went to considerable expense and trouble to make surreptitious—"boot-leg"—mailings of the Boise Valley Herald in his struggle to frustrate the unjust and tyrannical order debarring him from enjoying his common mailing rights. He sent his paper as first-class mail from 25 different post offices in all. He made his conduct known to the authorities by frequent editorial allusion. At last the American Civil Liberties Union, that had been agitating Cornell's rights, but without success, received a letter from the Solicitor of the Post Office Department that meant that Cornell could mail his publication third class, taking responsibility for any violation of the law. The letter read :—

Post Office Department,
Office of the Solicitor,
Washington, Dec. 7, 1942.

Mr Arthur Garfield Hays,
General Counsel,
American Civil Liberties Union,
New York.

My Dear Mr. Hays,

In reply to your letter of the 1st instant with respect to "The Boise Valley Herald" you are advised that the postmaster at Middleton, Idaho, has been instructed not to withhold from dispatch current mailings to this publication. He, however, has been instructed to request the publishers to furnish copies for submission to the Department.

The acceptance of the mailings for dispatch is no indication that the Department has reached a conclusion that this is a mailable publication or that certain issues in themselves are mailable, and should any violation of the law result from the deposit of this matter in the mails, the person who mailed or caused the matter to be mailed will have to bear full responsibility therefor.

Very truly yours,
VINCENT M. MILES.

Cornell published this letter in his issue for December 17, 1942, followed by a bold comment, headed "The Way to Challenge Power Is To Defy It."

Declaring that he took his stand by Amendment I. of the Constitution, and was prepared to challenge the power that was usurped by office-holding Cæsars, Cornell declared that, in this way, he was prepared to light a candle of resistance. He recalled how the stand of William Lloyd Garrison led to Garrison being dragged "through the streets of Boston with a rope round his neck."

Cornell describes what followed :—

Wendell Phillips was a young lawyer whose attention was attracted from his office-work to what the well dressed mob was doing. Phillips was not scared at what the mob was doing. Phillips was not scared at what the mob might do to him bodily or to his business. Instead of being fearful for his bodily safety and prudent for his professional interests, Phillips was electrified with the outrage of the thing and he flung himself into the defence of that victim. The power of his eloquence was heightened by the dignity of his manhood—"prudent" men have no dignity of manhood. On that day an opponent of slavery was brought into action whose powers as an arouser of public sentiment out-shone the candle power of Garrison something as a multiple-wat electric bulb outshines those of a tallow dip. Phillips' masterful pleading aroused into action the Stowe family and Henry Ward Beecher and John Greenleaf Whittier and maybe even had something to do with the part played by Abraham Lincoln. Yet, while these were gifted in powers of popular appeal, the character of the manhood of such pioneers as Lovejoy and Garrison was not outmatched by any of them. It took outstanding character, not outstanding talent, to light the first candles of agitation.

And so our Comrade Cornell rejoices in being "a village editor" and by the challenges of integrity "lighting a candle."

Defining what his paper struggled for, Cornell says :—

Constant and realistic recognition of the fact that we are in the midst of the period of transition from private capitalism to social collectivism. We stand for political Constitutional democracy and ultimate Social Ownership and democratic management of the means of production and distribution. We do not vision our part as being above the struggle, but as an immediate and vital part of it which means that we must be tough in taking bad treatment.

On Thursday, December 14, 1944, the Boise Valley Herald issued Number One of its 36th year. Until June 14, 1928, our contemporary was known as The Middleton Herald. To that date, for 1820 consecutive weeks, our contemporary had preserved a faithful record of the three events of major importance in the career of the ordinary citizen living in Boise Valley, and it had reached out and dealt with political events of world importance. Whilst remaining a local paper, as regards events of family interest in the district of publication, by its fearlessness and progressiveness, the Boise Valley Herald has been lifted to the heights of world journalism. It is one of the most useful and most readable papers published in the English-speaking world and should be read and circulated by radical and libertarian thinkers and good citizens of the world in every corner of the world where the English language is spoken.

Defining his position, "village-editor" Cornell wrote to us as follows one day last fall :—

My inspiration has been to publish a truly model Village Paper (I mean model in the sense that its editor and publisher is neither bought nor browbeat). It seems to me that social, political and commercial expediency as it manifests itself in the Pulpit and Press is the curse of this generation. A Village Editor can do but little but the little that he can do is just as important to be done as that which applies to more far-flung realms of activity. "It is better to light a candle than to curse the darkness." And I know of no quote that is more timely than this at this moment.

POWER WITHOUT PRINCIPLE

Our contemporary, the Catholic Herald, in its issue reproduces an editorial, bearing the above heading, from the columns of the London Left-Wing Labour weekly, The Tribune, with approval.

The Catholic Herald introduces the reproduction with the following wise and timely commentary :—

This paper has always cherished the hope that when it comes to clear moral fundamentals Catholics will find themselves at one with millions of others from whom they may widely differ in religion, politics and social views. Only if this proves to be the case is there much hope for the world.

We are delighted to run across a striking example of this happening.

The Socialist weekly, "Tribune," is very suspicious of Catholics, and this paper disagrees very heartily with most of what "Tribune" advocates. Yet times are such that we find this Left-wing organ printing a leading article under the above title each sentence of which might have appeared in this column.

The sentiments, in fact, are so well expressed and the article (we trust) so significant of how honest men are thrown back on to moral fundamentals in a gangster world that we are reproducing the greater part of it. Some brief omissions from the original are due to space. There is in fact not a sentence or even an emphasis in the "Tribune" article which we would wish to alter.

The Tribune editorial, as thus abridged, reads as follows :—

By the time this appears in print the much heralded conference between Stalin, Roosevelt and Churchill may be in session. . . .

We feel bound to say that there is nothing in the situation surrounding the conference which justifies optimism for the future. From the first the three Great Powers have insisted that the problems of future security depend upon whether they can reach agreement among themselves.

Of the three Great Powers, Britain was the most foolish in accepting that logic, for she is the weakest of the three. It is in her interest, as it is in the interests of all mankind, that the power of principle should be considered at least equally with the principle of power. Had she done that the smaller nations would have been brought into consultation in the first instance, and the argument shifted on to a plane more suited to her condition and more congenial for civilised discussion.

As it is, Britain has accepted a test from which she cannot hope to emerge the victor. Even in terms of old-fashioned power politics her decision was wrong, and she will pay for it by a declining influence in world affairs.

In the days when he was a supporter of the League of Nations Mr. Churchill held that it was in the long-term interests of Great Britain to assert the principles of international co-operation because the British Commonwealth is a congeries of nations so situated that it is incapable of defence in a world swayed by power politics alone. He showed more wisdom then than he is displaying now. Now he has allowed himself to sit down to a game in which his opponents hold the winning cards.

The absence of representatives from the smaller nations at this particular Conference will prove the decisive factor in the peace settlement. It is they who have the most interest in asserting fidelity to principle in the making of the peace. When they were left outside the conference door principles were left outside also, as will soon be most bitterly clear.

The two concrete tests for the conference are, of course, Poland and Germany. If these are to be decided by a naked use of power stripped of all principle, then both are doomed and with them all hope of permanent peace. Russia may have a case for the rectification of her western boundary at the expense of Poland. Her case is historical, although history is an extremely bad guide in these matters. Few nations can agree about the date when injustice began.

A better guide would be provided by the wishes of the populations concerned, and Russia should have been contented to accept that principle. However, apparently she is not, and so we must assume that Poland will lose a large portion of her eastern territory to Russia. Having done that, Russia, then, for some queer reason, thinks that Poland should be compensated by absorbing German territory down to the Oder. What is the logic of that? It is just that Poland should lose some territory to Russia. Where is the need for compensation? Where is her grievance if she loses what ought not to belong to her? There is no discernible principle at work in that, and so we are compelled to look for the explanation elsewhere.

In our view it is to be found in the need to provide the Lublin Committee with something to bolster up its prestige with the Polish people. The Lublin Committee is a creature of Russia and from all the evidence it has no popular basis among the Poles. It is hoped to provide this by stoking up unhealthy Polish nationalism at the expense of a large territory which is 100 per cent. German, and which Poland cannot hope to digest or hold without the military backing of her powerful Eastern neighbour. The truth compels us to state that the only conclusion from all this is that the Soviet Union wishes to carve up Eastern Germany in order to maintain her own Quisling Government in Poland.

That, of course, is naked power politics, and it is not made less so because it is practised by the Soviet Union. On the contrary it is made worse because millions of people all over the world look to the Soviet Union to give a civilised lead and not join in the jungle fight with the capitalist Powers. Furthermore, our Communist friends, in defending it, deprive themselves of the right to complain of British behaviour in Greece. It is painful beyond expression that the Soviet Union is not following up the success of the Red Army by assuming the moral leadership of the world, a leadership which is now vacant.

If we set aside the claims of nations wishing to make themselves strong at the expense of other nations, there is no difficulty in applying a consistent principle, although its application may vary in its incidents in different places. Czechoslovakia, for instance, in stead of a wholesale expulsion of millions of her German-speaking citizens, should try to solve the problem of the Sudeten Germans by allowing them freely to decide whether they want to remain or go to Germany. If they wish to go to Germany, then they should receive compensation for the loss of their possessions. In most other instances the people and the territory should remain in the nation chosen. If the guiding principle is always the desire of the individual men and women affected, it should be possible to bring about a European settlement placid and strong. Experience has shown beyond all doubt that nations suffer from political indigestion if they try to assimilate unwilling minorities. It should surely be possible this time to avoid the same silly mistake without, on the other hand, falling into the opposite and monstrous mistake of compulsorily expelling millions of human beings from their native soil.

The economic rehabilitation of Europe will be rendered possible only if the political framework is so arranged as to leave no deep and self perpetuating resentments. The long-term solution must be sought in the economic integration of Europe. But the short-term point of departure for it is wisdom, sanity and a sense of pity in the post-war settlement. We would be easier in our minds if we could believe any of these will find a place at this Conference.

All of which is good Socialism, sound democracy, and commonsense.

U.S.M. COMRADE SENTENCED.

Alex. Lang, a member of the U.S.M. in the United States, was convicted and sentenced to three yeears of imprisonment in a Federal Penitentiary, week ending January 27, 1945, for his refusal to serve in the armed forces. The judge denied to him the right to claim conscientious objection as a Socialist. Lang was active in distribution of the Word, and in unifying the Socialist Movement in U.S.A. During 1944 he acted as manager of the New York Call Book Service, and made it a thriving and useful institution. He helped to organise the Institute for Socialist Research. Now for his refusal to identify Socialism with the wholesale murder of war he has been sent to three yeears of loneliness, abuse and petty secret tyranny.

Comrade Lang fought Nazism and Fascism for many years whilst the American capitalist class was flirting with German-Italian Dictatorship. For this struggle against Fascism he was ridiculed and denied employment by the very class who now have sent him to jail for refusing to murder the victims of their one-time dictator friends. Comrade Lang has been sentenced for his love of human freedom and for his loyalty to the greatest religious command : "Thou shalt not kill."

Socialist comrades all over the world are with you, Alec, in spirit, and we will work with you and for the triumph of peace and commonweal throughout the world, now and forever. In your prison cell, may the inspiration of Eugene Debs be with you. Glory and honour to you in your witnessing under suffering and humiliation.

Lang joins those other Socialists in jail, whose principles, so staunchly expressed, stand as an indictment of war and capitalism.

THIS DRAFT IS DESPOTISM

Delivered in the United States House of Representatives, December 9, 1814.

By DANIEL WEBSTER

[The Draft Act of October, 16, 1940, was an official repudiation of the belief long held by America that the power granted to Congress by the people in the nation's fundamental law or written constitution was enough to preserve the United States as a nation. This belief opposed the spirit of liberty to the tyranny of arbitrary gavernment.

Daniel Webster made his great speech in opposition to a proposal for universal military conscription. At the time that it was made the stage was set well for conscription. The city of Washington had been burned by a temporarily victorious British Army. Two wars against Britain had been fought by that generation. Canada was a logical part of the United States. Military strategists argued that it was a menace of hostility. Thus everything favoured the campaign for conscription and conquest. Webster's great speech arrested the militarist policy of conscription and invasion. One of the greatest, and one of the most timely and most useful speeches ever delivered in the history of the United States, Daniel Webster's speech was suppressed, and blacked-out of the "Congressional Record" for nearly one hundred years.

Born at Salisbury, N.H., January 18, 1782, Daniel Webster died on October 24, 1852, at Marshfield, Mass. A farmer's son, he became one of the greatest advocates, and most famous orators, in the United States. He was admitted to the Bar in 1805 and was sent to Congress in 1813. He settled in Boston as an Advocate and made his name by his distinguished pleading and conduct in the Dartmouth College case. His speech at the bi-centenary of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers was one of the greatest orations in the English language, and was a speech of liberty. But the man grew timid and conservative. He enjoyed office and sacrificed his conscience and his talents to the idea of a career. Yet he failed to be nominated for President.

His attitude towards slavery was cowardly, although he avowed himself opposed to slavery. His anti-militarism was definite. He opposed war with England in 1844, and with Mexico in 1845. He had to repel a charge of corruption in 1846.

He became representative for Massachusetts in December, 1823, and a Senator a year later.—Ed.]

Mr Chairman: After the best reflection which I have been able to bestow on the subject of the bill before you, I am of the opinion that its principles are not warranted by any provision of the Constitution. . . . This bill . . . is an attempt to exercise the power of forcing free men of this country into the ranks of the army for the general purposes of the war, under colour of a military service. . . . The services of the men to be raised under this Act are not limited to those cases in which alone this Government is entitled to the aid of the militia of the states. These cases are particularly stated in the Constitution, "To repel invasion, suppress insurrection or execute the laws." (Article I, Sec. VIII, No. 14.) But this bill has no limitation in this respect. The usual mode of legislating on this subject is abandoned. The only section which would have confined the service of the militia proposed to be raised within the United States has been stricken out.

This, then, Sir, is a bill for calling out the militia not according to its existing organisation but by draft from new created classes; not merely for the purpose of repelling invasion, suppressing insurrection or executing the laws but for the general objects of war—for defending ourselves or invading others as may be thought expedient, not for a sudden emergency or for a short time but for long stated periods. . . . What is this, Sir, but raising a standing army out of the militia by draft, and to be recruited by draft, in like manner, as often as occasions require?

It is discussion, Sir, of the last importance. That measures of this nature should be debated at all in the councils of a free government is a cause of dismay. The question is nothing less than whether the most essential rights of personal liberty shall be surrendered and despotism embraced in its worst form.

I have risen on this occasion with anxious and painful emotions to add my admonitions to what has been said by others. Admonition and remonstrance, I am aware, are not acceptable strains. They are duties of unpleasant performance. But they are, in my judgment, the duties which the condition of a failing State imposes. They are duties which sink deep in his conscience who believes it probable that they may be the last services which he may be able to render to the Government of his country. On the issue of this discussion, I believe the fate of this Government may rest. Its duration is incompatible, in my opinion, with the existence of the measures in contemplation. A crisis has at last arrived, to which the course of things has long tended, and which may be decisive upon the happiness of present and of future generations. If there be anything important in the concerns of men, the considerations which fill the present critical hour are important.

It is time for Congress to examine and decide for itself. It has taken things on trust long enough. It has followed executive recommendation till there remains no hope of finding safety in that path. What is there, Sir, that makes it the duty of this people now to grant new confidence to the administration and to surrender their most important rights to its discretion?

Let us examine the nature and extent of the power which is assumed by the various military measures before us. In the present want of men and money, the Secretary of War has proposed to Congress a military conscription. For the conquest of Canada the people will not enlist, and if they would, the Treasury is exhausted and they could not be paid. Conscription is chosen as the most promising instrument both of overcoming reluctance to the service and of subduing the difficulties which arise from the deficiencies of the Exchequer. The administration asserts the right to fill the ranks of the regular army by compulsion. It contends that it may now take one out of twenty-five men, and any part or the whole of the rest, whenever its occasions require. Persons thus taken by force and put into an army may be compelled to serve there during the war or for life. They may be put on any service at home or abroad, for defence or for invasion, according to the will and pleasure of Government. This power does not grow out of any invasion of the country, or even out of a state of war. It belongs to Government at all times in peace as well as war, and is to be exercised under all circumstances according to its mere discretion. This, Sir, is the amount of the principle contended for by the Secretary of War.

NO MAGNA CARTA TO BE SLAVES.

Is this, Sir, consistent with the character of a free Government? Is this civil liberty? Is this the real character of our Constitution? No, Sir, indeed it is not. The Constitution is libelled, foully libelled. The people of this country have not established for themselves such a fabric of despotism. They have not purchased at a vast expense of their own treasure and their own blood a Magna Carta to be slaves. Where is it written in the Constitution, in what article or section is it contained, that you may take children from their parents and parents from their children and compel them to fight the battles of any war in which the folly or the wickedness of Government may engage it? Under what concealment has this power lain hidden which now for the first time comes forth with a tremendous and baleful aspect to trample down and destroy the dearest rights of personal liberty? Who will show me any constitutional injunction which makes it the duty of the American people to surrender everything valuable in life or even life itself, not when the safety of their country and its liberties may demand the sacrifice, but whenever the purposes of an ambitious and mischievous Government may require it?

Sir, I almost disdain to go to quotations and references to prove that such an abominable doctrine has no foundation in the Constitution of the country. It is enough to know that that instrument was intended as the basis of a free Government and that the power contended for is incompatible with any notion of personal liberty. An attempt to maintain this doctrine upon the provisions of the Constitution is an exercise of perverse ingenuity to extract slavery from the substance of a free Government. It is an attempt to show, by proof and argument, that we ourselves are subjects of despotism and that we have a right to chains and bondage, grimly secured to us and our children by the provisions of our Government.

It has been the labour of other men at other times to mitigate and reform the powers of government by construction; to support the rights of personal security by every species of favourable and benign interpretation, and thus to infuse a free spirit into governments not friendly in their general structure and formation to public liberty. The supporters of the measures before us act on the opposite principle. It is their task to raise arbitrary powers by construction out of a plain written charter of national liberty. It is their pleasing duty to free us of the delusion, which we have fondly cherished, that we are the subjects of a mild, free and limited Government, and to demonstrate by a regular chain of premises and conclusions that Government possesses over us a power more tyrannical, more arbitrary, more dangerous, more allied to blood and murder, more full of every form of mischief, more productive of every sort and degree of misery than has been exercised by any civilised Government, with a single exception, in modern times. . . .

A free constitution of government is to be construed upon free principles and every branch of its provisions is to receive such an interpretation as is full of its general spirit. No means are to be taken by implication, which would strike us absurdly if expressed. And what would have been more abused than for this Constitution to have said that to secure the great blessings of liberty it gave to Government an uncontrolled power of military conscription? Yet such is the absurdity which it is made to exhibit under the commentary of the Secretary of War.

But it is said that it might happen that an army would not be raised by voluntary enlistment, in which case the power to raise an army would be granted in vain, unless they might be raised by compulsion. If this reasoning could prove anything it would equally show that whenever the legitimate powers of the Constitution should be so badly administered as to cease to answer the great ends intended by them, such new powers may be assumed or usurped, as an existing administration may deem expedient. This is a result of his own reasoning to which the secretary does not profess to go. But it is a true result. For if it is to be assumed that all powers were granted, which might by possibility become necessary, and that Government itself is the judge of this possible necessity, then the powers of Government are precisely what it chooses they should be.

IF CONSCRIPTION, THEN CONFISCATION.

Apply the same reasoning to any other power granted to Congress and test its accuracy by the result. Congress has power to borrow money. How is it to exercise this power? Is it confined to voluntary loans? There is no express limitation to that effect, and in the language of the Secretary (of War) it might happen, indeed, it has happened, that persons could not be found willing to lend. Money might be borrowed then in any other mode. In other words, Congress might resort to a forced loan. It might take the money of any man by force, and give him in exchange Exchequer notes or certificates of stock. Would this be quite constitutional? Sir, it is entirely within the reasoning of the secretary, and it is a result of his argument, outraging the rights of indiviiduals in a far less degree than the practical consequences which he himself draws from it. A compulsory loan is not to be compared, in point of enormity, with a compulsory military service.

If the Secretary of War has proved the right of Congress to enact a law enforcing a draft of men out of the militia into the regular army, he will at any time be able to prove quite clearly that Congress has power to create a dictator. The arguments which have helped him in one case will equally aid him in the other. The same reason of a supposed or possible State necessity which is urged now may be repeated then with equal pertinency and effect.

Sir, in granting Congress the power to raise armies, the people have granted all the means which are ordinary and usual, and which are consistent with the liberties and security of the people themselves, and they have granted no others. To talk about the "unlimited power of the Government over the means to execute its authority is to hold a language which is true only in regard to despotisms. The tyranny of arbitrary government consists as much in its means as in its ends, and it would be a ridiculous and absurd constitution which should be less cautious to guard against abuses in the one case than in the other. All the means and instruments which a free Government exercises, as well as the ends and objects which it pursues, are to partake of its own essential character, and to be conformed to its genuine spirit. A free Government with arbitrary means to administer it is a contradiction, a free Government without adequate provisions for personal security is an absurdity, a free Government with an uncontrolled power of military conscription is a solecism (absurdity) at once the most ridiculous and abominable that ever entered into the head of man. . . .

In my opinion, Sir, the sentiments of the free population of this country are greatly mistaken here. The nation is not yet in a temper to submit to conscription. The people have too fresh and strong a feeling of the blessings of civil liberty to be willing thus to surrender it. You may talk to them as much as you please of the victory and glory to be obtained in the enemy's provinces. They will hold those objects in light estimation if the means be a forced military service. You may sing to them the song of Canada conquests in all its variety, but they will not be charmed out of the remembrances of their substantial interests and true happiness. Similar pretences, they know, are the graves in which the liberties of other nations have been buried and they will take warning.

Laws, Sir, of this nature can create nothing but opposition. If you scatter them abroad like the fabled serpents' teeth, they will spring up into armed men. A military force cannot be raised in this manner but by means of a military force. If the administration has found that it cannot form an army without conscription, it will find, if it ventures on these experiments, that it cannot enforce conscription without an army. The Government was not constituted for such purposes. Framed in the spirit of liberty and in the love of peace, it has no powers which render it able to enforce such laws. The attempt, if we rashly make it, will fail, and having already thrown away our peace, we may thereby throw away our government.

Humanism and International Education

[As comrades know we are a member of the Humanist Society of Friends. The following article is a kind of blue print, outlining the programme and practical activity of the Pacific International University, sponsored by the Humanists in U.S.A. In a later issue we shall publish pictures of the University; an educational study by our colleague, Professor Lowell H. Coate; and an essay on the Humanist Philosophy of Higher Education by Professor J. Herschel Coffin, Ph.D., Director of Curriculum of the Pacific International University. The present essay is only an introduction to a full discussion of this urgent subject, which concerns every citizen of the world. Although the Humanist University is established in U.S.A., and a special appeal is made to all our American readers to rally to its aid, and so extend its influence, there exists a no less urgent need to humanise University education in Britain and even to establish Universities along the lines of the United States pioneer institution.—Ed.]

A MODERN NECESSITY

Pacific International University, chartered under the state laws of California, is founded to meet a necessity which has grown out of the trends of the modern world. The common interests of human survival demand that man shall conquer the expanding frontier of human relations, as he has already conquered the geographical frontier and as he continues to master the scientific frontier of technological power.

The Second World War has compelled humanity at last to realise that governmental policies of nationalistic states enforced by arms and by economic pressures, in the spirit of cultural and racial superiority, can no longer be relied upon to secure culture or to preserve civilisation. The specific necessity is to discover a different approach to the solution of the interests and issues which are involved.

Genuine education, elevated to the international and inter-racial level, holds the promise of an effective solution to these world problems. International education is therefore the new approach which is here proposed. Even the dream of a world government of free peoples cannot be realised apart from the common understandings and mutual confidence which education with an international viewpoint is able to supply.

DEDICATION

Pacific International University therefore has dedicated itself to the task of laying the foundation for this world understanding. More specifically, this task is to pioneer in opening up the new frontier of world education.

In the service of all mankind, this University holds tenaciously to the following guide lines:

1. Rigorous scientific objectivity and the scientific method.
2. Broad humanitarianism, with a concern for the welfare of all men everywhere without prejudice of race, colour or religion.
3. Appreciation of all peoples, with warm regard for the special excellencies of their cultures.
4. A common search for the good life, men and women as fellow-humans irrespective of nation or race or religion serving as its Board of Trustees, its Faculty and its Student Body.
5. Co-operative and democratic spirit and practice, students, teachers and management participating in the various activities and policies.
6. A central interest in the Americas and the Orient, ultimately to spread throughout the world, striving to unite the peoples of the various continents and islands in an intellectual and cultural brotherhood.
7. The eventual establishment of Humanist Universities, with like dedication in all lands, serving all people and all individuals equally, regardless of place of birth or settlement.

A NEW PHILOSOPHY OF EDUCATION

The founders of Pacific International University are convinced that even education cannot achieve this common understanding so long as it continues in the prevailing pattern of the Western world. They believe that if, during the past century, educational institutions had been dedicated to world understanding and co-operation, both the first and the present world conflict might have been avoided. But they further believe that the perpetuation of our present segmented curricula, and the competitive nationalism which present educational methods foster, will inevitably tend to precipitate continued and even more devastating conflicts.

An entirely different educational approach is demanded if education is to become the solvent of human conflict situations. The new philosophy of international education advocated may be indicated in the following statement of principles:—

1. For the intellectualistic, "ivory tower" ideal of "scholarship," substitute the goal of healthy, mature personality on the one hand; and the goal of a healthy, mature social order on the other hand.
2. Join the practical with the theoretical in a work-study plan.
3. Synthesize the useful arts, the liberal arts and the fine arts, into the art of living.
4. Substitute the life-situation technique for the departmentalised subject-matter technique. That is, study the basic life situations which are:
   - The vocational situation;
   - The avocational situation;
   - The family life situation;
   - The community life situation;
   - The philosophy of life situation, underlying all these.
5. Individualise each person's educational program.
6. Correlate the individual's many informal educational experiences with the formal.
7. Substitute progress reports for the competitive grading system.
8. Establish an international centre for co-operative living where these principles may be taught and practised.

The United States has representatives of all nations, races, religions and classes in its midst, claiming citizenship. This is true of the entire English-speaking world, but particularly true of the United States. Humanists, therefore, in America seek to apply this new educational Humanist approach to resolving internal conflicts as between racial, economic, cultural, religious and social groups. In this way, transforming society and affecting radical or revolutionary change pacifically and usefully.

Humanists have, further, in the Southern California area social laboratory in which this new educational philosophy may be tested and perfected. Its validity can be established in a highly cosmopolitan environment, prior to being applied throughout the Pacific basin and, then, throughout the world.

LOCATION AND SIZE

A ready-made site for Pacific International University was available on the campus of Chapman College at 766 North Vermont Avenue, Los Angeles. Here, in an ideal location, were the necessary buildings for classrooms, auditorium, laboratories, libraries, gymnasium, dining facilities and living quarters. This commodious campus occupied a full city block of more than five acres across the boulevard from the Los Angeles City College, which is a unit of the Los Angeles Public School system.

Chapman College faces Vermont Avenue and lies between Los Angeles and Hollywood, where the transportation facilities centre for both. It is but a few short blocks from the College to the beautiful Barnsdall Park with its Art Museum, and just beyond lies the 3000-acre Griffith Park with its classical Greek Theatre, the Observatory and Planetarium, and its extensive Recreational Centre. It is less than an hour's drive to the near-by mountains and beaches. Nowhere in all the world is there a better natural setting for an international education centre, surrounded as it is with world-famous cultural, artistic, scenic, entertainment and recreational institutions and facilities.

The College has sufficient dormitory rooms and other essential equipment comfortably to accommodate 500 resident students, with classroom space for an additional 500. One of the dormitories resembles an apartment building, being so planned that it can serve as an "International House" and thus provide living quarters for students of many races and nationalities.

As in the case of all educational institutions, Pacific International University welcomes gifts and contributions from its friends.

WORLD SITUATION AND EDUCATION

The world situation is ripe for this new educational movement; the philosophy of education has been formulated; the blue-print for a new type of educational institution is ready; and the equipment is at hand. Humanists dare not by-pass this strategic opportunity and this solemn obligation. They accept the challenge for "the building of a new world education and a new civilisation."

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Our valued Freethought contemporary, The Truth Seeker, of New York, in its issue for December 1944, published the following paragraph:—

The Duke of Bedford, it should be known, on taking his seat in the English House of Lords, Dec. 3, 1941, did not take the oath of office, but affirmed, being the first member of that body ever to do so.

This is a somewhat postponed reference to the Duke's action, but it certainly places the fact on record. And it is an important fact in the history of libertarian struggle. Our British Freethought and Rationalist contemporaries made no reference to the Duke's stand.

The Peace News, New York, in its issue for September 1944, in its "Peace Students' Bookshelf," under the heading, "World Disarmament Imperative," published a two-column summary of the Duke of Bedford's pamphlet on Total Disarmament.

Our contemporary introduces its summary and quotations with the following comment:—

Just as we had selected a number of interesting and significant pamphlets published by American organisations for review in these columns, a copy of the article by the Duke of Bedford on universal disarmament, recently published in pamphlet form, was received from overseas. From time to time we have found ourselves in sharp disagreement with certain attitudes expressed in the speeches and articles of the noble Duke. The subject matter of this article is so pertinent and the argument for world peace through disarmament so convincingly presented, however, we are devoting the entire "Peace Students Bookshelf" in this issue to the following quotations from the pamphlet.

The Daily Record, Glasgow, for Monday, February 12, 1945, published the following report of the Duke of Bedford's main address in Glasgow on Sunday, February 11:—

DUKE OF BEDFORD ON RUSSIA.

"There exists the grave danger of a future war with Russia," said the Duke of Bedford, addressing in Glasgow yesterday, the Union of Democratic Control.

"We went to war to protect Poland," he said, "but now we must allow the Russians to seize more of that country than Hitler demanded, and tolerate the Quisling Polish Government of Communists."

The Duke of Bedford described the U.S.S.R. as "the only country which does not admit the Red Cross or any other international body."

WAR:
I Think I'll Sit This One Out

By MILTON S. MAYER

(Assistant to the President, University of Chicago)

[Mr. Mayer contributed this article to the "Saturday Evening Post," October 7, 1939.—Ed.]

Justice alone knows liberty, equality and fraternity, and justice is a human virtue arising from man's human capacity to reason. We cannot make sense out of justice by looking at the moon or taking dope or building battleships. We can make sense out of justice by using our reason to discover why justice, like wisdom, is better than rubies.

It is sensible military tactics to recognise the enemy before you shoot. The common enemy is the animality in man, and not the men here and there who are behaving like animals at the moment. Neither science nor prayer nor force will save us. What will save us is the reason that enables men, in ancient Israel or modern America, to choose between guns and butter, and to choose well. When we have produced men of reason, we shall have a world of reason, and the Hitlers will disappear. As long as we produce men of force we shall have a world of force, and Hitlers, whoever wins the wars, will carry the day.

Society may make many demands on me, as long as it keeps me out of the cave. It may take my property. It may take my life. But when it puts me back into the cave I must say, politely but firmly, to hell with society. My ancestors were cannibals without benefit of parliaments.

My friends conclude that I can't be "reasoned with," and they agree to gang up on me with one last "ad Hominem" appeal.

"What good can you do in jail?" they ask. "A Debs, yes. But whoever heard of Mayer? Who cares if Mayer opposes the war?"

And my answer is that Mayer is indeed inconsequential, but a thousand Mayers, a million Mayers, ten million Mayers, may prove to be too many to ignore. And if there are only a hundred Mayers this time, their example may produce a thousand Mayers next time. That will mean a lot of wars before the Mayers are heard, but I can wait.

And if there is only one Mayer, his case against this war remains the same. That one Mayer will have to take his kicking around like the man he claims to be, and he may not get a chance to open his mouth, much less build a better world. But he will have taken his stand, not because he thinks God or the big battalions are with him but because he can take no other. And he will have to say, with William the Silent, that it is not necessary to hope in order to undertake, nor to succeed in order to persevere.

SHAKESPEARE ON WAR

BY C. H. NORMAN

Every time that St. George's Day comes round, which is the same date as the alleged birthday of Shakespeare, certain public men indulge in displaying their familiarity with several well-known passages from "King John" and "Henry the Fifth." But, in fact, Shakespeare had little opinion of the ways and deeds of the powerful as presented in his historical plays.

On the subject of war, nothing could be more direct than this analysis of the lot of the ordinary soldier in all campaigns, in all ages: "Boult: What would you have me do? Go to the wars, would you? Where a man may serve seven years for the loss of a leg, and have not money enough in the end to buy him a wooden one?" (Pericles, Act IV: Scene VI.)

Then there is the scene in the Third Part of Henry the Sixth, where the son who had killed his father at Towton Field, and the father who had killed his son pass across the stage in the presence of the king, leading the latter to indulge in some melancholy reflections. (Henry the Sixth, Part III, Act II: Scene V.)

In Henry V, Act I: Scene II, Shakespeare exposes, through the mouth of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the shallowness of the excuses for the war of aggression contemplated against France, which Henry, hypocrite that he was, was seeking religious sanction for.

Another interesting passage is in Scene I, Act IV, Part 2, of Henry the Fourth, where the Archbishop of York declares: "A peace is of the nature of a conquest: For then both parties are nobly subdued: And neither party loser."

Another instructive scene is the one between Timon and Alcibiades ("Timon of Athens," Act IV, Scene 3); also, in "Troilus and Cressida," Scene 8, Act V, where the cowardly brutality of a famous classic "hero" is exposed.)

Typical examples of Shakespeare's unrelenting analysis of the ferocity and cowardice of the militarists of the Wars of the Roses period are found in the description of the murder of the young Earl of Rutland by young Clifford (Scene III, Act I, Part III, Henry the Sixth), in Scene V, in the Second Act, where Clifford himself is killed; in the murder of the Duke of Suffolk, Scene V, Act I, Part III of Henry the Sixth; in Scene VI, Act III, of Richard the Third; and in the truly remarkable scene in Act IV, Scene IV, of the same play, in the closing words of Henry Bolingbroke (afterwards Henry the Fourth); in King Richard the Second, Act V, Scene VI; and, finally, in the speech of the Duke of Buckingham on the scaffold in Act II, Scene I, of Henry the Eighth. There is also the famous graveyard scene (rarely given in full) in Hamlet, Act V, Scene I.

It is not without significance that the two most quoted patriotic speeches are put by Shakespeare

(A) In the mouth of the Bastard Faulconbridge, a mere go-between of that ruffian, King John, whose conduct in reference to the incitement to the murder of Prince Arthur is plainly laid before the reader, Faulconbridge being represented at the end as the one loyal apologist and supporter of King John. Incidentally, the passage is filled with historical untruths, as England "did lie under the proud foot of the conqueror" under the Romans, the Danes, the Saxons and the Normans; and in all her major wars, England has looked to the assistance of powerful states like France, the Germanic Powers, Russia and the United States, besides others.

(B) In the mouth of Henry the Fifth, who was a thorough rascal, whose misgovernment has still left its mark on the realm, and whose deeds, compared with his words, mark him as one of the greatest hypocrites, next to Elizabeth, who ever sat on the English throne.

One thing clear, above all things, is that Shakespeare had a proper valuation of the "religious" outlook of the Archbishops, bishops, cardinals, and the like, who appear in his pages. The quotation given above is the only sentiment that might properly be described as Christian which falls from clerical lips in the whole of the plays.

A close comparison of the speech of Henry the Fifth before Agincourt, of the speeches of Henry of Richmond and Richard the Third before the Battle of Bosworth, of the speech of Mark Antony, after the murder of Cæsar, with the Noodles Oration of Sydney Smith, would rather suggest that Shakespeare regarded the utterances of these personages as of the same character as those satirised by Sydney Smith in "The Noodle's Oration," which are so often indulged in by those politicians and statesmen whose knowledge of the ideas of Shakespeare is apparently limited to the two well-known patriotic effusions of the Bastard Faulconbridge and Henry the Fifth.

CONVICT 9653

Our pamphlet Convict 9653 is well printed and deserves a wide circulation. It tells the story of the United States great Socialist Anti-Militarist, America's Vision Maker, Eugene Victor Debs. It is sold at the popular price of 2d and can be ordered through the post for 3d. Socialist and Pacifist groups should order in quantities. A dozen copies will be sent, post free, for 1s 6d.

Ernest A. Davies, in the Daily Herald, London, for June 7, 1923, described Eugene Debs' great meeting in the huge hall of Madison Square Gardens, New York, in April of that year.

Describing his treatment by the United States Government, Debs said :—

They thought they had me in prison; but they had not. They thought they had suppressed me, but they had not.

They took from me my citizenship of the United States, but they did not rob me of my citizenship, for I am a citizen of the world.

He recalled the names of Washington, and the immortals, Thomas Jefferson and Thomas Paine. He told his audience of John Brown of Harpers' Ferry. And he added :—

You are teaching your children to-day to revere the names of these men, these "agitators," these "demagogues," these "disturbers of the peace," these "traitors" of a century ago, while all the respectable majority who called them such sleep in forgotten graves. The world does not know they lived.

And he concluded, powerfully, dreamily, and with his soul stirred with his vision of the world to come—on earth :—

I see a world where thrones are trembling and kings are dust. A world where slavery has ceased and the name of masters has been forgotten. A world where all is art, beauty and joy, where war and hate have ceased.

Workers unite, rid yourself of your chains, and take possession of that world.

At Atlanta Prison, Debs, no longer, but merely a number, Convict 9653, was asked his religion. He replied :—

I have no preference—I have a religion of my own.

Father Byrne, the Catholic chaplain, testified :—

I have learned since that he not only has a religion but he has a religion which he lives in every act.

Debs regarded his gaol as a monastery and his cell as a cubicle of meditation—a genuine monk's cell. He explained himself on a visit from a comrade :—

One never does really know one's own soul until the world in which one functions is suddenly taken away.

In prison, Debs wanted to serve society's unfortunates. In prison garb, he ministered in the hospital to the most loathsome cases of suffering.

Sam Orr was a negro "lifer" and unmanageable. Naturally, the authorities put him for months in a dungeon on bread and water which he shared with rats. They hung him by the wrists, chained and flogged him. They deprived him of water, but even thirst did not break him. Fellow-Convict 9653 talked to Sam Orr with such effect that his release on parole was secured.

Attorney Castleton described the influence of Debs on Orr :—

DEBS VISITED IN PRISON.

Eugene V. Debs (centre), wearing prison clothes, with members of the Socialist delegation who went to Atlanta Prison, Georgia, to inform him he had been nominated as Socialist candidate for the United States Presidency.

Debs just loved Orr, understood him, sensed his errors and frustration. He made Orr realise the depth of his sympathy and understanding. Slowly Orr responded. He flowered. Debs is a modern St. Francis.

Prisons are the obseene concentration camps erected by the reputed good for the better victimisation of the alleged evil. Often it is but the persecution of the unfortunate by the fortunate, of the sorry miserable failures of conventionalism by the sorry miserable pompous braggart successfuls of conventionalism. The successfuls threw Debs, the protestant, the prophet, the unsuccessful into their concentration camp. The greatness of the man worked miracles. He purified the atmosphere. In the hospital, unclean words ceased from utterance—without so much as a word against the practice being said by him. The man was respected and his rebel purity and impassioned humanist cleanness of soul and understanding were obvious. His personality defined and urged morality.

Asked to explain, he said quietly :—

All I have tried to do is to break down some of the bars that imprison the soul.

Debs in prison was a study in victory over environment. His radiant happiness in suffering and service was a spectacle of light shining in dark places. The spirituality of the man explained his definition of Socialism.

Debs said :—

If Socialism were a scheme to make every one rich, it wouldn't appeal to me at all. I wouldn't give one ounce of my energy to turn the United States into a nation of Rockefellers. Socialism is not meant to make every one rich, but is an opportunity to make every one function. It sets all free to serve.

Convict 9653 is a booklet that ought to be circulated widely by the Socialist movement.

American comrades can secure the pamphlet, "Convict 9653," from David Berkingoff, 315 East 209 Street, Bronx 67, New York. Price, 5 cents. Postage extra.

With this issue our paper becomes 3d. The annual subscription becomes 4s.0d., post free. We regret the change but we must overcome our debts. Our comrade, Frank Burgess, of Birmingham, has sent us £10, and a letter of encouragement, urging us to open a deficit fund with this donation. The letter will appear in the next issue and the fund opened. The paper and work must go on.

I ACCUSE CHRISTENDOM

By Rev. EDIS FAIRBAIRN

Christian Community Minister, Windermere, Ontario, Canada.

"To Maintain Courage by Sharing Conviction."

I accuse evangelical Christendom of having bungled a great opportunity.
It, in effect, rediscovered the scriptures,
and particularly the Gospels;
but instead of prosecuting the campaign for the Kingdom of God on earth, it took refuge in theology, ecclesiology and mysticism.

I accuse evangelical Christendom
of maintaining a half-faith in the Incarnation.
It fervently believes that God became man in Christ,
but not that Christ was incarnate in a nation,
a social order, and a historical situation.

I accuse evangelical Christendom
of piously hankering after a "timeless" religion; meaning by that one independent of mundane factors and situations like nationalism, war, and economics, and the other actualities of life;
when it is perfectly obvious that we know absolutely nothing about God save as He reveals Himself under conditions of time, space, and circumstance; and we have no dealings with Him, except by meeting Him where He works.

I accuse evangelical Christendom of turning aside from the social righteousness of the Sermon on the Mount,
to the salvation and sanctification of the individual, and of seeing in the service of God only the obligation to get other persons interested in their own salvation and sanctification.

I accuse evangelical Christendom of the sin of patronising Jesus Christ instead of obeying Him.
It has spiritualised His teachings, interpreting, distorting, or ignoring them, until it has made it possible for allegedly Christian nations to render lip-service to Jesus
While actually worshipping the twin foes of Jesus,
Mars and Mammon.

I accuse evangelical Christendom
of being wiser and more spiritual than God, when it complains with unctuous complacency that of course it is not up to the Church to provide a blue-print for a Christian Social Order, and thus implicitly snubs Jehovah,
who chose to use for the revelation of Himself,
a nation, a people, a concrete social unit, giving them a law which was first and foremost a blue-print of a definite kind of social structure, and only incidentally a set of rules for sacrificial worship.

I accuse evangelical Christendom to-day of timidity and oblique vision.
It ought to have dished communism before that ever got started, by insisting long ago, and asserting ever since,
that persons are more precious than property.

I accuse evangelical Christendom
of taking pride, complacent, pious pride (as though it were the summit of religious achievement) in making "law-abiding citizens," when it ought to have created law-making and law-changing citizens.

I accuse evangelical Christendom
of thus betraying the essence of the Gospel, without excuse of ignorance,
for the reason,
thrust down deep into the subconscious that it was reluctant to soil its lily-white hands, or to sully its sentimental spirituality,
by grappling with the nasty, dirty,
sordid, messy, tiresome, dangerous task, of getting God's will done on earth socially, economically, and internationally.

THE MINERS

Ye're heroes, aye, ye're heroes,
When workin' doon the mine.
They slap yer back an' praise ye,
Ye're gallant lads an' fine,
Toilin' there among the damp
Where nane o' them wid daur,
Ye're heroes, aye, ye're heroes,
When gettin' coals for war.

They humour ye, an' praise ye,
As ye keep the bunkers fu',
An' the convoys bring the foodstuffs
That they ration out to you;
Or the troopships tak' yer brithers
To the battlefields afaur,
Ye're heroes, aye, ye're heroes,
When gettin' coals for war.

They'll promise ye high heaven
As the furnace flames ye feed,
In a world that's mad wi' murder,
Truth is sacrificed to greed;
As the factories belch their smoke-clouds
An' their profits daily soar,
Ye're heroes, aye, ye're heroes,
When gettin' coals for war.

It was yince a different story—
Dae ye mind their hunnish tricks?
They battoned ye in "Twenty-One,"
Ye were jailed in "Twenty-Six."
Did they aid ye in the "Thirties"
As yer miseries did increase?
Ye were traitors, rogues, an' workshies
In the pipin' days o' peace.

They flatter to deceive ye,
Their creed is aye the same;
Watch them when the victory's won,
They'll try the same auld game.
Forget their rosy promises—
Remind them if ye daur,
An' see how they treat the heroes
Who produced the coals for war.

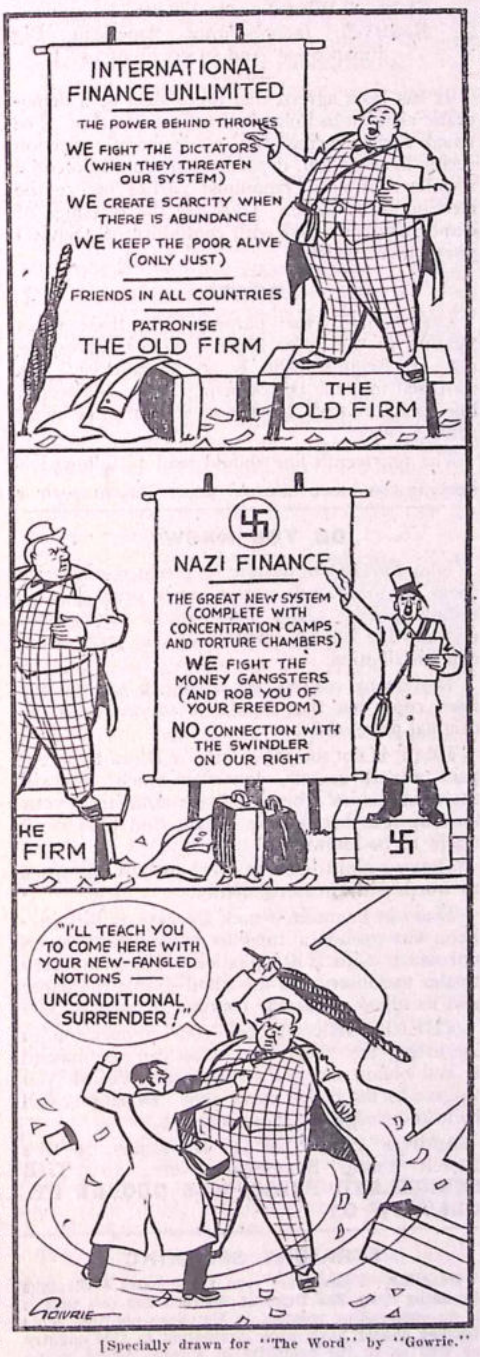
NOTES AND COMMENTS
BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

"The airman with his bomb does indirectly and in a great degree irresponsibly what he could never face doing directly and responsibly. No unperverted man could work at close quarters and with his own hands inflict the kind of injury on women and children which any bomb of any airman may produce."
—"Science, Wisdom and War" (Peace News pamphlet).

One of the main causes of war, and indeed of other grave evils as well, is the unwillingness of the ordinary person to think and to face up to all that a certain course of action in which he personally may be implicated, involves. He prefers to live in a cloud-cuckoo-land of thought-shirking, unimaginative unreality, and it is one of the main functions of propaganda to keep him in such a state. As Captain Mumford has pointed out, there is no difference between throwing a number of babies upon a fire and throwing fire upon a number of babies, and only propaganda and unwillingneess to think prevent the identity of the two actions from being realised.

"The only channel for moving goods is money, therefore the dams across the channels which prevent the free flow of goods are financial."
—STUART CHASE.

It is rarely that an economist as well known as Mr. Stuart Chase talks so much good sense. The financial powers usually take good care to see that real economists blush unseen and waste their sweetness on the desert air!



[Specially drawn for "The Word" by "Gowrie."

THE UPSTART

It is stated that between the years 1909 and 1918 American industry produced 390 billion dollars worth of goods for consumption, but only distributed 260 billion dollars of purchasing power in the form of wages, salaries, profits and dividends; also that during the years 1927 and 1928 Australian factories produced 416 million pounds worth of goods but distributed only 130 million pounds in wages, salaries and dividends. In both cases the difference between the value of the goods produced and the amount of purchasing power distributed in a form available for buying consumable goods represents either goods which had to be exported without bringing in any corresponding value of imports, or goods which had to be destroyed because, though probably desired, they could not find purchasers at prices fair to the producers. The main causes of this shortage of consumer purchasing power are the indirect results of investment and of increasing mechanisation, which the present financial system does not allow to be made good in any sensible fashion.

A war indemnity of some hundred million dollars or more has been imposed by Russia upon Hungary. The currency in which the amount of the indemnity is expressed is curious and apparently significant, seeing that Hungary has no dollars, nor has she the right of creating them. It looks uncommonly like a typical racket by money-creating and money-lending American financiers. It would not be surprising if the latter, by a stroke of the pen, created dollars to the amount of the indemnity demanded of Hungary by Russia, and lent it to the Hungarian Government. American citizens would then be put to work to make goods to the value of the indemnity for export to Russia; while Hungary would be expected to export to America goods only to the value of the interest on the loan. The plan would bring in a nice little tribute to the American financiers, but would be bad for the American nation since the latter would toil to produce for export to Russia goods to the full value of the indemnity but all that would come back in return would be Hungarian goods to the value of the interest on the indemnity loan—a very much smaller amount. The American financiers are probably hoping to get away with their plot quite easily because of the ignorance of the American public of matters relating to finance, and because of the extent to which they, like the British public, are still hypnotised by the foolish and out-of-date notion that, in an age of labour-destroying inventions and discoveries, the performance of paid work alone entitles an ordinary person to receive an income wherewith to buy goods to satisfy his needs. American citizens engaged in manufacturing the goods for export to Russia will be earning wages by reason of their employment, and this fact, the financiers reckon, will be enough to keep the general public quiet, and indeed convinced that the financiers are rendering a most useful service to their country! It may also be the intention of the financiers to get Hungary into a position of unrepayable debt to the U.S.A., if they can.

A Hull coroner, replying to the question of a woman, "Why do they have to have wars and upset people's lives?" said, "You must blame the politicians. The higher they are, the worse they are." After affirming that most M.P.s had no interest in their constituencies, he added, "Things will have to be altered after this. They will have to get their orders from the electors. The electors are never consulted: they are treated with contempt." "Janus," of the Spectator, who seems much offended by these sensible remarks, writes: "A little course of Burke on this subject wouldn't hurt the Hull coroner." And a little common sense and honest facing of realities wouldn't hurt "Janus"!

We learn that to prevent fraternisation between members of the occupying army and the German population after the war, military camps are to be established outside the large towns, as "self-contained communities." Except when on duty, the soldiers and airmen will be restricted to these camps. They will be sent during duty hours into the towns to police the administration and population, but will not be allowed in the towns at other times. Entertainments and social amenities will be provided within the camps, which will include large A.T.S. contingents. It is proposed that this administration shall continue for 25 years and that it shall then be tempered off during a period of another 50 years! An officer's comment on this wonderful scheme—"Just b—— daft"—seems entirely adequate.

On January 8th, Lord Cranborne said in the House of Lords, "'If after this war there are set up dictatorships all over Europe, whether of the Right or of the Left, then we may have beaten Hitler but we shall have lost the war." Well, the dictatorships are springing up like mushrooms, as the Government spokesman in the House of Lords should be able to see if he is not entirely blinded by wishful thinking. Those who cannot accept truth when it is put before them and take sound advice, are more likely to live to see their fears realised than their hopes.

According to the report of a Jugoslav officer mentioned in The Catholic Herald, General Tito is maintaining a private concentration camp, with the appropriate attendant atrocity programme, even over here at Leigh-on-Sea. After he had been arrested by one of General Tito's minions, the officer, on several occasions, heard cries and shouts and the sounds of men being beaten.

A friend whose family have been living in Belgium during the war learns that economic conditions are now much worse there than they were under the Germans. This only confirms reports which are constantly coming in from the liberated or conquered countries. UNRRA seems to be in a complete mess and the paper money issued by the Allies in Italy with the Four Freedoms written on it is commonly seen with "Freedom from Want" crossed out by an angry hand. Surely the American Government, at any rate, with ample economic resources and a very large quantity of shipping, could do a bit more to prevent the Allies from making themselves even more unpopular in Europe than the Axis?

In a recent speech at Manchester, Mr. Herbert Morrison said that democratic governments "must be ready to maintain civil liberties and the freedom of the Press, and to deal firmly and in a realistic spirit with really dangerous, subversive plotters, high and low." In other words, they must maintain civil liberties by imprisoning under a form of Regulation 18B all those whom they, being judges in their own case, choose to consider "subversive plotters," and all publications must be suppressed on a similar principle.

Mr. Winston Churchill's past views on the same subject are also interesting, especially as it is possible that he has not changed them. Lord Riddell, in his "Intimate Diary of the Peace Conference and After," writes, in June 1920: "I told Winston of Lenin's speech in which he said that the day of pure democracy was finished and that freedom of speech and freedom of the Press were its two chief characteristics. "Why should these things be allowed," he went on, "why should a government which is doing what it believes to be right allow itself to be criticised? It would not allow opposition by lethal weapons. Ideas are much more fatal things than guns, and, as to the freedom of the Press, why should any man be allowed to buy a printing-press and disseminate pernicious opinions calculated to embarrass the government?"

It is reported that half of the 15,600 Canadian soldiers who were recently warned for overseas service failed to return from embarkation leave. It begins to look as if young men in Canada were at last having some doubts about the likelihood of this war for freedom and democracy achieving its professed aims!

"Peace News" states that the War Office have denied that they issued any order forbidding Christmas celebrations for German prisoners in hospital. In these days when our rulers so constantly say and do things of which one had hoped English gentlemen were incapable, it is quite a refreshing change to learn at least of one caddish action of which they have been accused unfairly.

Conference mottoes of the Big Three:—
Churchill—"What I have I hold"!
Stalin—"What I want I'll get"!
Roosevelt (representing American Big Finance)—"And so say all of us"!

It has been agreed that there shall be a democratic election in Poland with a secret ballot. The usual Soviet recipe for a democratic election seems to be to kill, deport, or intern all potential members of anti-Communist parties before the election takes place. Thus are the blessings of democracy combined with continuity of (Soviet) government policy!

STRAIGHT SPEAKING

Dear Sir,—I have just read the booklet "Straight Speaking" by The Duke of Bedford and feel that it is an outstanding treatise on European politics. This booklet should have wide circulation in this country as well as in the countries of Europe, which would counteract propaganda which flows so freely over our radio stations and also emanates from some of our influential newspapers and politicians.

Yours sincerely,

A SOLDIER'S PROTEST

The following severe and unanswerable censure of our statesmen, our clerics, our politicians, our public men and interests, whose conspiracy for greed and power gave us war, was published in the Dumfries and Galloway Standard, November 18, 1944:—

IN BURMA.

The parents of a Thornhill soldier serving in Burma have received the following verses from their son:

I am sitting here and thinking
Of things I left behind,
And I'd like to put in writing
What is running through my mind;
We've dug a million ditches
And have cleared ten miles of ground,
We have filled a million sand bags
And strewn them all around,
But there is one consolation,
Gather round me while I tell,
When we die we'll go to heaven
For we've done our stretch in hell.

We've built a million cookhouses
For the cooks to burn our beans,
We've done a million weary guards,
We have cleaned the camp latrines,
We've washed a million dixies,
Opened millions of tins of beans,
And killed a million mosquitos
That stuck to us like pins,
But when our work on earth is ended
Then our friends on earth will tell,
"When they died they went to heaven,
For they'd done their stretch in hell."

When the final call is sounded,
When we lay aside life's cares,
When we stand our last inspection
On those shining golden stairs,
The angels they will welcome us;
Their golden harps they'll play;
And the tune that they'll be playing
Is "No more parades to-day."
It is there we'll hear St. Peter
Say to us with a yell,
"Take seats, lads from the Jungle,
"You have done your stretch in hell."

WHEN THE WAR IS OVER

"When the war is over"—
That blessed phrase sublime!
So useful to the people
Who want to bide their time.

When the war is over
Everyone must build.
But what if all the builders
And architects are killed?

When the war is over
We'll have a brave new world.
But what if all the brave ones
Are in the furnace hurled?

When the war is over
We'll all be right as rain.
But when the earth is scorched with fire
When will it yield again?

When the war is over
Youth must take command.
But what if all the youth to-day
Are lost to war's demand?

When the war is over
We'll teach the Huns again.
But what if all the teachers
Are in the battle slain?

Perhaps the politicians
Will step into the breach.
But what if, when they're ready,
There's no one left to teach?

The builders and the architects
Are building to destroy.
The brave are at the battle front,
In youth there is no joy.

Teachers busy teaching
Men in schools of battle.
Statesmen putting off the day
With endless idle prattle.

Children sent to nurseries,
Mothers making guns,
Fathers sent out killing
Other mothers' sons.

Would it not be better,
Instead of "going to it,"
To stop the war and do it now
While yet we've men to do it?

MADELAINE J. MOORE.

GLASGOW ANARCHIST C.O.

C.O. TRIBUNAL GRANTS UNCONDITIONAL EXEMPTION

SIR A. C. BLACK, K.C.

Sheriff Principal of Lanarkshire; Chairman of Glasgow and S.W. of Scotland Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal; M.A., LL.B., Glasgow University; Assistant Editor Encyclopaedia of the Laws of Scotland, 1926-34.

[Reproduced from a Glasgow Newspaper sketch, probably "Evening Times"]

Since December 1939, we have published, in these columns, several reports of the cases heard by the Glasgow Tribunal. For a time this functioned as S.W. Scotland No. 1 Tribunal, but it seems to function for the whole of S.W. Scotland again. The Glasgow No. 2 Tribunal passed out of existence with the death of its chairman. Down to December 31, 1944, out of a total of 1310 cases heard, the No. 2 Tribunal had allowed only 11 unconditional exemptions, or .8 per cent. Its percentage of unconditional exeemptions was the lowest of all the Tribunals in Great Britain. To the same date, the Glasgow No. 1 Tribunal, out of a total of 2842 cases, had allowed 525 exemptions, or 14.9 per cent. Its percentage of unconditional exemptions was the highest of all the Tribunals in Great Britain. At least, the Glasgow No. 1 Tribunal proved itself capable of giving unconditional exemption if it considered such exemption met the circumstances of the case.

Our December 1939 summary of the Tribunal's decisions was a very full study of the opening cases. We reviewed the composition of the Tribunal and published an analysis of the ordinary press reports. The account read a little hot and a little cold. We criticised the chairman, Sheriff-Principal Sir A. Campbell Black, K.C., for variation of mood, whilst acknowleaging his readiness to put aside prejudice in many cases. We cited seven cases in which the Tribunal, under his direction, granted unconditional exemption in rapid succession. Against these decisions, we instanced nine of rejection without qualification, when the objectors, in our opinion, ought to have been granted such exemption. How the persons named have reacted since we do not know. Some of the persons refused exemption by the Glasgow No. 1 Tribunal have suffered imprisonment and been exempted, either conditionally or unconditionally, since. Those who have given in have justified their rejection for exemption, in the last analysis, is a matter of one's own conscience and does not rest on the opinion of any external Tribunal. Even some of the persons exempted at these early sittings of the Tribunal have, by their later conduct and war commentaries, proven themselves unworthy of the exemption granted and enjoyed. The proof of the pudding is in the eating of it. Unless persons are inspired by a clear pacifist conviction, or a definite opposition to the war of the moment, and are uncompromising in their attitude regardless of consequence, they are not entitled to enjoy exemption.

Conscription is wrong, thoroughly wrong in itself, and not wrong merely from the standpoint that it involves killing. But it could not be imposed without general popular consent. Opposition to it represents a minority challenge at a period of what is deemed, popularly, to be one of grave national crisis. Rightly or wrongly, the majority view is one of feeling or passion, almost instinct, and not of reason. The minority may be completely right. Time might prove them to be patriots of outstanding worth, using the word "patriotism" in its highest and true sense. But the fact has no bearing on the feeling of the time. At such a period, fair aand impartial consideration of the right to object, and willingness to record decisions of absolute exemption, represent a very high standard of impartial judgment. It is an act of judicial toleration that preserves the balance and sanity of public life and contributes to post-war harmony and progress. The institution of the conscience Tribunal is not a small concession to minority opinion. It is a vindication of the constitutional right of the citizen and places the right of obedience to conscience above loyalty to the State. Errors may occur, but the maintenance of the principle is a matter of vital importance to civilisation. It places integrity above clamour and gives it judicial status.

In 1939 we had suffered or enjoyed—however you view such experience—no personal experience of the Glasgow Tribunal. Despite our reluctance to appear before Tribunals, we have appeared before the Glasgow Tribunal several times since then, and understand its method of approach. Our approach to most questions is quite different from that of most members of the Tribunal, but each appearance has convinced us of the courtesy and fairness of the Tribunal. By which we do not mean to say that we endorse all its conclusions. Many comrades, including those whose claims have been rejected, have given us their impressions of this Tribunal. The general impression is favourable. We would say that the Glasgow Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal is the fairest and most impartial in Great Britain. It has dealt fairly and impartially, showing equal courtesy and consideration, with Catholic cases and with Atheist cases. It has granted exemption without regard to any consideration of status, politics, or religion. It has refused exemption to Town Councillors and to applicants for whom M.P.'s and Town Councillors spoke. It has granted exemption to Anarchists who appeared before it, without support or plea from any person of political or social status. An obvious working-man, most direct in his speech, has appeared alone and spoken the simple truth that was in him. No finesse of address. No tact. No diplomacy. The Tribunal has heard him with courtesy and granted him unconditional exemption. It has considered that, in such an instance, consideration and courtesy had to be discharged by the Tribunal, in much the same way as King Charles II. removed his hat in the presence of William Penn.

It is not easy to be judicial. Judges have prejudices and fixed opinions. On November 14, 1944, Sir Archibald Campbell Black addressed a meeting of the Women's Help Committee in the City Chambers, Glasgow, in which he criticised the "false and insidious philosophies" of B.B.C. speakers, and suggested that they were the root cause of delinquency.

We think that he is quite wrong in this statement. In our view, the "philosophies" of the B.B.C. do not help the problem, but they are not the cause of the problem. Indeed, they are parallel with the problem and arise from the same root. The B.B.C. "philosophies" are all part of the general delinquency.

We believe in moral law and we hold that it must operate in society, or civilisation must fall. But we believe that that moral law must operate from and through the individual. It cannot be imposed from without, neither by the Church nor yet by the State. That is why we place so much importance on the right of conscience. We hold that it is impossible to uphold war and conditions of war without spreading the appalling evil of delinquency. War is delinquency and spreads delinquency through the body politic like an epidemic. It is the disease of violence and force: savagery made perfect through civilisation to the challenge of civilisation. Conscience is the challenge offered by the spirit of civilisation to this scientific mechanisation of the past.

Among the Glasgow Tribunal cases reported in these columns are those of our colleague, J. T. Caldwell, who appeared before the Tribunal on October 21, 1940, and November 4, 1942; Annesley Aldred, January 28, 1941; William Dick, June 12, 1942; Miss C. Bertolini, November 17, 1942; Miss Maria Bertolini, July 15, 1943. In all these cases unconditional exemption was granted. Each case revealed great understanding and freedom from prejudice on the part of the Tribunal.

The Glasgow Tribunal once more revealed its freedom from bias in the case of Miss Johanna Ritchie Haining, of 63 Ashley Street, Glasgow, which was heard on Thursday, March 8, 1945.

In her application to be registered as a conscientious objector, Comrade Haining wrote:—

I am asking to be registered as a conscientious objector. I am opposed to war on moral and humanitarian grounds. My convictions proceed from definite principles and it is easy to explain my background. My father and mother have held Anarchist views since before my birth and I was reared in an atmosphere of discussion. For a number of years, my mother acted as resident housekeeper at 13 Burnbank Gardens, which was made into an Anarchist Headquarters for 16 years by Mr. Guy Aldred, who is known for his very definite views. Mr. Aldred has promised to speak for me before the Tribunal since he has known me all my life. Although I have a brother who is serving in the Army, I retain my anti-war views. I object to helping war and although I may feel timid at times, my attitude is quite clear and definite.

If my case is heard by the Tribunal, I am prepared to explain the background and basis of my views more clearly.

The case was 174, and was entered on the Cause List as Sheet No. 8, Line No. 4. The Tribunal consisted of the chairman and four members, two of whom were women. The evidence obtained at the hearing was summarised as follows:—

Age 27. Engaged in a Printing Works. Statement read and handed in. Has no religious beliefs. Wrong to kill anyone. Letter from Mr. Guy Aldred received by post. Mr. Guy Aldred spoke on applicant's behalf.

The statement read and handed in by Miss Haining was as follows:—

I do not think there is much I can add. My mother brought me up in an atmosphere of Pacifism and instilled into me the wrongs and horrors of War, but had I never had that teaching I could not be otherwise than I am, a strong opponent of injustices and cruelties, and war which is the most senseless of all.

I am as sorry for the suffering of the German mother as I would be for my own and I think the German people are no more responsible for what their governments do, than we are, for what our government is doing now.

I could never assist in making weapons of war for destroying people. To me, the bombing of a city, no matter where that city might be, is wrong. I do not think in terms of countries but of people.

It is true that my brother and sister did not respond to my mother's teachings in all things but we are not all built alike.

I have read a little of Tolstoy but I feel that I do not need to read books to know that war is wrong. I am sorry if I have not made myself clear. I am very sensitive of saying anything in public but my mind is perfectly clear on one thing. I will not, in any way, help the war.

The letter that Aldred sent to the Tribunal emphasised the fact that her father was an Individualist Anarchist, opposed to war and violence, and that her mother had been a Communist Anarchist since 1910.

Miss Haining was questioned as to her Atheist views and the relation of Atheism and Materialism to conscience and the claim for conscientious objection. She was questioned closely but treated with great courtesy.

Defending the right of an Atheist to be a conscientious objector, Aldred stated that he was an Atheist and that he believed in integrity and the supremacy of conscience. He recalled the views advanced before a meeting of the Faculty of Procurators at Glasgow by the former Sheriff-Substitute of Lanark (1927-39), Mr. George Wilton Wilton, K.C.

The unanimous decision of the Tribunal was—

(a) That the applicant, shall, without conditions, be registered in the Register of Conscientious Objectors.

In recording this decision, the Glasgow Tribunal tends, once more, to challenge the view that, in its war against Nazism, the British Govermental Administration has adopted, without qualification, the machinery and methods of a Fascist dictatorship. The decision is of great importance; for the granting of such complete exemption to a person who avows that she has no religious belief, and is practically an Anarchist, is not merely a humanitarian concession to one who is in a small minority. It is a recognition by the Government that the individual citizen may, without a belief in God or the future life, feel a higher loyalty to his own private philosophy of life than to the State as such. In that there is much significance, as, despite the situation of emergency, and the claim of the State to be supreme above the individual, a Court, established by the State, records its view of the integrity and conscientious vision of an avowed enemy of the State—an Anarchist. The propaganda value of this to the Allied cause may be said to be beyond estimate. And this may be true. Or it may not be true. But it is of inestimable value to mankind itself, an example of tolerance and understanding to be remembered and to be emulated in the years of social crisis that must succeed the war years.

By such decisions as that given in the Haining case, the Glasgow Tribunal sows good seed—the seed of patience and understanding, of harmony, non-coercion, and individual responsibility. Its chairman and members are to be congratulated on their wisdom. The results will be good.

It is doubtful whether Trade Unionism can change its fundamental strategy without a complete revolution, both in leadership and in methods of organisation—a revolution which will, of course, be stoutly fought by the present leaders and by a not inconsiderable section of the Trade Union rank and file.—G. D. H. Cole, in "Great Britain in the Post-War World" (page 154).

The Crimea Conference Debate

By The Duke of Bedford

Most human beings including those who, like average Members of Parliament or Dictators, are in a low category from the standpoint either of morality or intelligence, are a curious mixture of good and evil, sense and folly. This came out rather markedly in the House of Commons Debate on the Crimea Conference. Mr. Arthur Greenwood who in 1939 appears to have had as large a share in driving the country into war as any member of the Labour Party, achieved a high level of intelligence which, though not maintained throughout his speech, was, nevertheless, something better than one would have anticipated. He said that he hoped that depriving the German people in peace-time of an opportunity of obtaining war potential would not mean impoverishing the German people. "Not this country" he said "nor any country in the world could profit by the more or less permanent impoverishment of sixty to eighty million European people. It would be foolish economically and it would be bad from the broad humanitarian point of view." He went on to say that the Big Three must not in any event regard themselves as the overlords of Europe; also that he did not think that they ought to determine the fate of the smaller nations which do not possess either their economic resources or their military power. The value of a nation to human life, culture and civilisation is not measured by its size, but by its quality. Mr. Greenwood also insisted on the need for fair treatment for Poland and on the desirability of making available for all peoples what economic resources there are in the world, without any political considerations whatever. This last admirable aim, however, would have been more reassuring if it had come from a Member who, while having been given ample opportunities for understanding the fundamentals of monetary reform, had not, so far, failed to identity himself with monetary reformers.

Sir William Beveridge, though the author of a very lamentable plan for social insurance which makes no effort to challenge the fundamental evils of the monetary system but promises to rivet upon the nation many new shackles of bureaucratic tyranny, said, by way of contrast, many wise and enlightened things when dealing with the international situation. He pointed out that the fact that Russia has liberated Poland is not any reason why she should have any part of the country she has liberated, adding that it is essential for us to see that the Polish Government is one chosen to please the Poles and not one chosen to please either Soviet Russia or ourselves. He condemned the partitioning of Germany, saying that the partitioning of a country by force is futile and he suggested that a Technical Committee should advise at what stage of production it was necessary to stop Germany from turning what may be useful goods into destructive munitions, adding that he hoped that interference would only prove necessary at a very late stage of production indeed. (Incidentally, if the world could ever achieve that degree of sanity which favoured total disarmament, the advice of such a Technical Committee would be useful for the protection of all countries against their neighbours.) Sir William went on to point out that you cannot extirpate Nazism, or anything else, by suppression. You can only do so by providing something to replace it. Education, he said, involves the co-operation of the pupil and you cannot educate someone who does not wish to be educated. It was also pointed out in the course of the speech that we have to substitute an alternative to war for the settling of all disputes between nations and not merely in regard to Germany and Japan. The Great Powers must convince the other nations that when they speak of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving nations they mean that the rights of a nation shall not depend in any way on the strength of its arms, otherwise every nation will have to arm again and armaments will breed war.

It is imperative, he said, that besides agreeing with our friends we should stick to principle in international affairs. If it happens that one cannot both stick to one's friends and stick to principle, one must stick to principle because principles do not change, but friends, even if they appear at the moment to be unreasonable, may change and become reasonable. Opportunism, appeasement, self-regarding policies, power-politics all lead to the grave of all our hopes.

Captain Alan Graham made a very unfortunate start, but did better towards the end of his speech. He said that our basic purposes for which we went to war were to promote our national and imperial security and to maintain our belief that the State exists for the individual. If our real aim had been to promote our national and imperial security—and no doubt some warmongers had this idea in view—then it was an extremely selfish one. Our action in declaring war was also stupid, for Germany was not in any way threatening our national or imperial security. All that was threatened was the Prudential Insurance Company's interests in Polish mines and the interests of money-creating financiers of the City who feared that Germany's policy of making money subservient to production might spread to other countries. As for the State existing for the individual, it is becoming daily more apparent that in a hundred different ways the individual in this country is being treated as though he existed for the State and will be so treated even when the war has ended if our bureaucrats are allowed to have their way.

Captain Graham did, however, considerably better when he got on to the question of Poland and the rights of freedom, present and future, of the Polish people. Speaking of the free and unfettered elections promised at Yalta, he asked what sort of a chance they had. He pointed out that the Polish Provisional Government, appointed by Moscow, is at this moment so controlling the country that no independent opinion is allowed at all. All wireless receivers have been confiscated and broadcasts can only be heard at places controlled by the Provisional Government. The Lublin Minister of Education has informed the professors of Cracow University that the Rectors and Deans of Faculties will not be elected as formerly, but appointed by the Government. Professors, writers and scientists are forced to sign declarations denouncing the Polish Government in London as traitors and, if they refuse, they are arrested, imprisoned or murdered. The present Lublin Commander in Chief, under whom the soldiers of the Underground Army are forced to serve, was imprisoned for five years in pre-war Poland on the charge of embezzling money alotted for the purchase of gas masks. Since 1939 more than two million Poles have been forcibly deported to Russia and Siberia and the actual rulers of present-day Poland are the Russian Secret Police. Captain Graham went to say that if we found ourselves obliged to consent to our Polish allies being robbed of their homes, we should find them a home in the Empire. This, incidentally, is the most important practical way of helping the victims of any political persecution, whether the persecutors be Axis, Russian or of any other nationality. It is not an easy way, since unfortunate people are often neither pleasant, desirable nor reasonably grateful people, but it remains a way involving infinitely less sacrifice from the benefactor nation than going to war on their account and some of its most serious difficulties would be removed by the adoption of a sane financial system which related the income of a country's inhabitants to goods produced and imported and not merely to wages, salaries and employment.

How to Abolish Anti-Semitism

By George W. Hartmann

The world to-day is one vast sea of hate. Racial, religious, class, national, and political hatreds hurt us all and prevent mankind from achieving the happiness that science would seem to make possible for the first time in history.

Anti-Semitism is one persistent and nasty illustration of the way in which bad social conditions produce bitterness and hostility between different parts of the human family. If we want to cure this state of affairs we must be willing to attack the problem at its roots and not just "paint the pimple" of an unlovely disease of modern society. Anti-Jewish feeling is real and it does no good to deny its existence. Fundamentally, it is similar to anti-Negro sentiments among many whites, or dislike for Orientals among people reared in an Occidental civilization.

The fact that some people are different from others is no reason for injuring them. In fact, many human differences (like those between the sexes) are positively evaluated. Differences between people should make for enrichment and not for bitterness. Unfortunately, some politicians have discovered that they can deflect criticism of their unsavoury schemes and simultaneously maintain the unity of one group better, temporarily at least, if they can direct hostility to some real or imaginary enemy. This is known to psychologists as the scapegoating mechanism, since it channelizes the irritation of the in-group against a convenient out-group and away from those really responsible for the trouble. The results are bad for both those who are discriminated against and those who do the discriminating, but until the comman man understands its causes, it will continue to weaken the fabric of community life. Most anti-Semites are unfortunate individuals who have been badly thwarted in their reasonable ambitions; they must be patiently helped to find more rational outlets for their sense of defeat.

Christians can learn to have sympathetic insight into the situation of the Jewish masses by simply practising what Jesus preached. This is hard—but it must be done. Americans must also learn that hate is not a constructive emotion, for it hinders the solution of grave social problems rather than helping them. We cannot use other nations as scapegoats without doing harm to ourselves in the process.

If we really mean business about creating better race relations in America, we should set aside some of the funds now being spent on death and destruction for the purpose of experimenting with new and improved ways of establishing attitudes of understanding and appreciation for all groups, no matter what their origin or tradition. For example, if a sample set of committees before an intense programme of re-education show 60 per cent. anti-Jewish feelings and after it has been operative show no more than 40 per cent. anti-Semitism (as measured by certain tests of belief and conduct), we can be thankful for that 20 per cent. gain. This method has been successful on a small scale, but there is no reason why it should not be adopted far and wide if we are honestly searching for a true social democracy.

In addition to such vital experiments in applied psychology, the following five-point programme practically guarantees the end of anti-Semitism and all other types of bad race relations:—

1. End this war now. So long as people are boiling and seething with hate for the Germans or Japanese, some of this anger is bound to spill over upon domestic minorities like the Jews and Negroes.

2. Re-organize our major social institutions with the direct intention of reducing the amount of fear and emotional disturbance from which all insecure people suffer.

3. Make a sustained and definite educational effort to weaken uncritical national loyalties as interpreted by some unwise leaders who say one can't be a good American unless one hates somebody else. Common sense tells one that love for one's wife does not require one to hate one's mother.

4. Increase popular knowledge of the psychology of race differences. Diffusing the results of research in the field of comparative or cultural anthropology usually has the effect of demonstrating that the actual differences between races are quite small and of relatively little practical importance.

5. Create a universal joint co-operative effort by all members of the human family, including the Germans and Japanese, to abolish the real natural enemies of mankind, viz., poverty, vice, crime, ignorance, disease, and the ever-present threat of war.

Until such a clear-cut plan like this one is adopted and vigorously put into effect, we must expect to have anti-Semitism and other hurtful forms of discrimination because we have not been ready to pay the price in thought and effort required to remove the conditions which produce them. We have the necessary technical knowledge to create a better state of affairs; all that is lacking is the will to put it to work.

Civil Aviation and World Unity

A Manifesto for Discussion

Issued by the World Airways Joint Committee, promoted by World Unity Movement.

FIRST PRINCIPLES

Frontiers cannot be drawn across the skies. Whatever political and economic barriers men have contrived to erect between countries, the air is common to them all and is indivisible. Aviation must, therefore, be planned in terms of world co-operation.

The spectacular growth which this generation has witnessed in air travel has been overshadowed by preparations for war. The airplane is identified in the public mind, particularly in the minds of the young, with the warplane.

Yet air transport should, by its very nature, make for world unity. It brings people together and increases their inter-dependence. Its true function is that of a world-wide service ministering to the common needs of men and women. Henceforth, the use and development of aviation must be directed towards peace and prosperity, not war and domination.

The essential step, then, in freeing aviation from its artificial and anti-social subservience to the dictates of fear, force and greed, is to urge upon both peoples and governments the adoption of constructive policies inspired by a world vision.

HOW WORLD AIRWAYS WOULD WORK

The following scheme outlines an air policy designed to promote human wellbeing everywhere, and is consistent with the organisation of a good peace:—

(1) The fundamental aim indicated above should be laid down in the preamble of any formal international agreement completed for the purposes specified below.

(2) The ownership and control of the planes and other equipment in use on all world or supranational air routes should be vested in a world airways organisation, consisting of representatives of all the peoples, chosen in such a way as would not subject the organisation to any strongly nationalistic or sectional interest.

(3) Regional organisation of airways should be encouraged, especially, no doubt, during the early stages, within the general framework of the World Airways Organisation, as would best serve the particular needs of travel and trade in such regions as Europe, the Americas, the USSR and Asia, and others.

(4) The Organisation should be empowered to purchase outright or to acquire by long-term leases from the states concerned the main landing grounds and other territorial centres needed for its operations, and these areas would be exempt, under conditions to be agreed, from state sovereignty.

(5) The Organisation should be financed by means of an international investment trust, established under its sole authority, along the lines of a public corporation, whose capital should be publicly subscribed and carry a low maximum rate of interest. The chief object of these measures would be to make possible cheap and efficient services, not monetary profits to investors. By means of the fund thus created, the Organisation would buy, as circumstances demanded, from governments or from private manufacturers, the planes and other equipment needed, and all such transactions would be given full publicity.

(6) The personnel—pilots, engineers, managers, mechanics and others—should be selected on grounds of their technical qualifications and general fitness from all nations, without discrimination on ideological, racial or other similar grounds, but in such a way as not to overweight the representation of any one nation; and they should be free, for the period of their service, from the obligations of national allegience.

INDISPENSABLE TO WORLD PEACE

There are no insuperable administrative and technical difficulties in the operation of a World Airways Organisation. Schemes like the above have been proposed by various governments and other competent authorities for over ten years. France, Spain and Sweden, for example, promoted such a plan in 1933, and a similar scheme is at present being advocated by Australia and New Zealand.

It is not claimed that the foregoing proposals are sufficient by themselves to ensure peace among men; or even that they cover more than a few of the factors involved in air development.

For the sake of brevity and clarity, intimately related problems connected with world transport, in general, and with the future of military aviation in particular, have been omitted. It is clear, however, from the experience of the Disarmament Conferences, that the reconstruction of civil aviation along these lines will enormously simplify air disarmament.

Now is the time to act. Only by such bold and radical policies can mankind hope to escape the unspeakable iniquity of a third world war.

If you are in agreement with this statement you can assist in realising these aims:—

(1) By inviting any of your local organisations to discuss the statement and to urge their members to give it active, individual support;

(2) By securing a reference to the matter in the correspondence columns of your local newspaper;

(3) By making the manifesto the basis of discussion in study and discussion groups.

LOOKING BACKWARD

Glasgow Corporation Graft

SOME PEEPS BEHIND THE SCENES

[November will witness the end of co-opted members of our Municipal Councils, and the resumption of elections. On the one side, the Conservatives are organising a caucus control of candidates in the interests of finance and reaction, open, avowed, and unashamed. On the other side, the Labour Party, nominally in the name of Socialism, is organising a caucus control. Apart from questions of Socialist theory, there is a corruption of power which makes it more and more impossible for the independent and social-service-minded citizen to play his part in politics, national or local. We expect no good from the Conservatives but we are concerned with the Labour movement; and we object to its ideals being controlled and dominated by the interests of a caucus or by the capitalist considerations of graft. Since we are told that, without surrender to a Labour caucus, a Socialist can have no place in public life, we make no apology for the following factual studies of careerism. For this "Socialist" careerism has not been killed by the war but is flourishing and being connived at actively at the present moment. The Labour movement is wanting still in spokesmen worthy of its great purpose, leaders of integrity.—Ed.].

All men can be criminals if tempted. All men can be heroes if inspired.—G. K. Chesterton.

I. EDINBURGH HIGH COURT, 1941.

On Thursday, September 25, 1941, three "Labour" Glasgow Town Councillors were found guilty of graft and sentenced to terms of imprisonment at the Edinburgh High Court, after a trial, lasting two and a half days.

The accused were:—Bailie Thomas Wilson, "Socialist," convener of the Corporation Gas Committee. Sentenced to 15 months' imprisonment.

Ex-Bailie Alexander Ritchie, "Socialist," subconvener of the Committee. Sentenced to 18 months.

Bailie Joseph Taylor, I.L.P. member of the Committee. Also sentenced to 18 months.

The indictment alleged that they solicited from Arthur Henry Lymn, chairman of Gas Chambers and Coke Ovens, Ltd., an inducement or reward for undertaking to use their influence to procure acceptance of a tender for reconstruction work at Provan Gas Works, and, further, that they received from Lymn by the hands of Ex-Bailie Hugh Campbell, £100, and by the hands of Councillor William Miller Duncan Anderson £25, £50 and £50 respectively.

The jury of seven, which contained five women, took 70 minutes to reach their conclusion.

They found that Wilson and Ritchie were guilty of soliciting a bribe, while acting in conjunction with Hugh Campbell, and receiving a portion of the bribe of £100.

The charge that they had corruptly received money from the hands of Councillor William Anderson, of Glasgow, was found not proven.

By a majority of six to one, the jury found the first two charges against Taylor not proven, but found him guilty of receiving money by the hands of Anderson.

The chief witness for the Crown was Ex-Bailie Hugh Campbell, formerly a member of the Licensing Bench, who was sentenced to six months' imprisonment in June at the Glasgow High Court on pleading guilty to receive £120 for undertaking to use his influence to procure a renewal of the Beresford Hotel licence.

None of the accused entered the witness-box to deny the allegations made on oath by Campbell.

On Wednesday, September 24, Campbell was in the witness-box for two hours.

Following upon a question by the Solicitor-General, Sir T. D. King Murray, the following dialogue ensued:—

Campbell—While we were in Portsmouth ex-Bailie Ritchie remarked: "Here we are walking round with an order for a quarter of a million in our pockets and there seems to be nothing doing."

Counsel—What did you take that to mean?

Campbell—With my experience of the corporation I assumed it was Ritchie's intention or hope that something in the way of a bribe or present might be obtained from the placing of the contract.

Campbell described how, after the visit to Portsmouth, he met the Chairman of the Gas Chambers Co., Mr. Lynn, at dinner. During the dinner, Campbell told Lynn the gist of Ritchie's remarks.

Counsel—Did you say anything about being satisfied or not satisfied with the work of the company at Portsmouth?

Campbell—I conveyed to Mr. Lymn that so far as I and other members of the deputation were concerned we were fairly satisfied that the company would likely get the order.

Counsel—Did you mention any difficulties in the way?

Campbell—The principal difficulty was the remark made by Ritchie.

Lymn suggested that Campbell have breakfast with him next day. He told Ritchie, Taylor, and Wilson of this arrangement. Ritchie suggested he should ask Mr. Lymn to make payment to the deputation of £2,000, and in return the deputation would recommend the firm for the contract. When the contract had gone through the £2,000 was to be divided among Taylor, Ritchie, Wilson and himself, in the proportion of £200 to Wilson and £600 to the others.

Campbell had breakfast alone with Lymn, and returned to the Strand Palace Hotel, which was the headquarters of the deputation. He conveyed to his colleagues what had transpired.

Counsel—What did transpire?

Campbell When Mr. Lymn understood the deputation were soliciting gifts he refused to have anything whatever to do with the proposal.

Counsel—Did you try to persuade him to give money?

Campbell—I think so. Particularly when we were visiting the work on Friday.

Referring to a visit to Brentford, where the Gas Chambers Co. had an installation, Campbell said that Lymn had the impression then that if his firm did not make a present to the deputation the work would pass them. "I made that quite plain to Mr. Lymn," added Campbell.

After leaving Brentford, the deputation had lunch, and the talk with Lymn was continued. Lymn was of the impression that he was being outbidded and would not get the job unless he bribed the deputation.

Lymn took Campbell aside and told him when he got back to London he would collect £100 as a gift to the deputation, apart from what should be done later. Lymn indicated that probably £2,000 could be divided, but that would be arranged by Mr. McNair in Glasgow.

Campbell added:

"While I was in Mr. Lymn's office he gave me £100 in small notes of £1 and 10/-. I was alone with Mr. Lymn.

"I returned to the hotel and, in one of the bedrooms occupied by one of the deputation, I gave Ritchie £50 and he understood he had to give half to Wilson.

"I also gave Taylor £25 and the balance I retained.

"I told them that probably £2,000 would come along later, but nothing would happen until the firm had definitely got the contract.

"I returned to Glasgow and saw McNair. I told him what had transpired in London. He told me he had been expecting me to call. I assumed some member of the company had informed him.

"When I told him about the money, he smiled and said he would have nothing to do with it."

In due course, Lymn's Company's tender was accepted.

While being cross-examined by Mr. D. P. Blades, K.C., for Taylor, Campbell exclaimed:—

"One of the men sitting there in the dock knows more about corruption than either you or I. That's Bailie Ritchie. Do you want any more?"

In passing sentence, Lord Fleming said:—

"Within a period of a few months, this is the third case which has come before this court in which members of the Town Council of Glasgow have been involved."

Thomas Wilson, referred to throughout the trial as "Old Tom," was 71. He entered the Town Council as a Socialist in 1935 and became a Magistrate in 1940. He was serving on four committees—housing, public assistance, transport, and gas at the time of his arrest. He seldom raised his voice in debate.

Addressing him, Lord Fleming said:—

"You have been found guilty of a very grave offence against public morality and good Government. It is impossible for me to pass a lenient sentence in your case, but I will make it less than otherwise might have been the case on account of your age and the medical certificate which I have here. Your medical condition, of course, will receive the due attention it requires in prison."

The sentence on Wilson proved to be a death sentence. Twelve days later, he died in Edinburgh Infirmary. He was removed from the prison to the Infirmary on Saturday and died on Monday, October 6.

Advising the jury in the case of Bailie Wilson, Lord Fleming dealt with the evidence of a witness, Gillespie, who was entirely disinterested as regards the corruption. According to that evidence, Bailie Ritchie was more directly associated with the solicitation of the bribe than Wilson.

The jury would remember particularly the expression used by Ritchie at Portsmouth, "Here we are with a contract worth a quarter of a million pounds in our pockets, and there is nothing doing."

Dealing with the conversation alleged by the witness, Gillespie, to have passed between himself and Councillor Ritchie in a Glasgow restaurant, Lord Fleming said to the jury:—"You may consider the Latin phrase, 'In vino veritas,' which means that wine often brings out the truth."

Ritchie, said Gillespie, was under the influence of drink, and told Gillespie that he had been to London on a deputation, and had been given a present of £100.

This is the second time Ritchie has been in the dock on charges under the Public Bodies (Corrupt Practices) Act. He was acquitted in February, 1933, of a charge of accepting a bribe. Ritchie is 56 years of age, and has been a member of Glasgow Town Council for 15 years. He fought in the last war and has the Mons Medal. For years he was lecturer in the Labour College. He entered public life through the medium of the Communist Party, under the patronage of William Gallacher, now "Communist" M.P.!

Joseph Taylor entered Glasgow Town Council in 1930, as the I.L.P. representative of Parkhead Ward. He was frequently suspended during Council "uproars" over the unemployed. The unemployed did not benefit but Taylor's reputation was advanced. He hit the headlines in 1933, when he defied the Lord Provost and read a letter that the Lord Provost had refused permission to be read. In 1937 he made another scene by walking out of the Town Council Chambers with the city's heavy, gold-gilt mace as a protest. He declined in 1938 to be a magistrate, but in 1940 he took a seat on the Bench.

Lord Provost, Sir Patrick Dollan, said to a Daily Express interviewer, immediately after the trial, that there was no need to waste any time on investigation. We agree that Capitalist society is corrupt and from that angle we might repeat this statement. From the standpoint of uncovering details we do not agree. There is much to be explained in connection with the Glasgow Corporation administration. We are not much concerned with sensational graft revelations, but we propose to introduce our readers to a few peeps behind the scenes, and to expose the hypocrisy of municipal life and the zeal for municipal "Socialism."

The Future of Trade Unionism

By GEORGE ROSE

[The following interesting essay, calling for discussion by the entire working-class movement, was published in the "Hairdressers' Weekly Journal, London, a year ago. The essay was divided over three issues, January 8, January 22, and February 5, 1944. We reproduce it to stimulate thought and understanding among comrades. Discussion is invited. Wherever workers assemble, and especially at Union meetings and conferences, the issues raised in this essay should be discussed.—Ed.]

I. ECONOMIC AND POLITICAL POWER

The article "Trade Unionism and the Future," which appeared in these columns four weeks ago, has drawn correspondence which raises controversial issues, and on that account I have undertaken to deal with them personally. It is fitting at the present time that these issues should be considered, and I appeal to those interested to be indulgent as well as patient whilst I say my say, for these issues will take more than one article to deal with.

Casting a mental eye over the contemporary scene I am greatly perturbed by the course the whole Labour movement seems to be taking. But unlike one comrade (Joseph Judd), I do not believe it is impossible to switch this course into channels likely to assist the emancipation of the whole working class. There is no denying that the class collaboration being indulged in by the prominent T.U. leaders not only constitutes a serious threat to the future welfare of the workers, but is a menace even to the possibility of revolutionary effort for social change.

There is shortly to be a meeting of the General Council of the Trades Union Congress to consider whether or not the T.U.C. will support a gigantic capitalist scheme to reconstruct the world after the war on a basis of a network of international cartels, put forward by the World Trade Alliance Association. The monopolists behind this organisation include Sir Edgar Jones, Lord Davidson (former Chairman of the Conservative Party), and A. A. Kilner, of Courtaulds.

Now, whilst this is most surprising, it is even more amazing that there should be working-class leaders ready to support the scheme. I understand those include J. Brown, General Secretary, Iron and Steel Trades; Chas. Dukes, Secretary, General and Municipal Workers; Arthur Deakin, Acting Secretary, Transport and General Workers' Union; Andrew Naesmith, Secretary, Weavers Amalgamation; and George Bell, Secretary, General Federation of Labour.

I also understand the business was recently discussed by the National Council of Labour, where it was suggested the Co-operative Movement would back the scheme, but I am pleased to say that they (the Co-operatives) have since rejected any idea of entertaining it at all, and rightly described it as "organisation of this character representing Big Business."

So far, so good. There is still the lamentable fact that there is a group in the T.U.C. ready to hand over the workers to the big bosses, and that these have already made an attempt to get the T.U.C. to endorse the scheme. Trade Unionists everywhere must be made conscious of the danger attaching to any arrangement of this kind, and I appeal to our members to draw the subject to the notice of every Trade Unionist with whom they come into contact.

It is my firm conviction if any such arrangement is tolerated by the organised workers of Britain, that Trade Unionism would be doomed to extinction. In view of all the wonderful pioneer work of the past, and the achievements in various directions, this would be a tragedy of the first magnitude, and would effectively prevent the T.U. movement from being used at all by the workers for the creation of a free society in which the unions of to-day can become the craft guilds to-morrow, effectively serving the workers in peace and in liberty.

Whether the Unions can be converted to this end or not, one thing is certain: they must steer clear of such entanglements as this. That the big bosses, both here and in America should be scheming to ensure that the profiteering system will continue after the war is perfectly natural, but it is also natural for the workers to refuse to be parties to any arrangement to that end.

What I propose doing in these articles is to indicate what I consider the workers should do if they cannot secure betterment under the system—to fight at least determinedly against all efforts of the ruling classes more firmly to fasten the shackles of the wages system about them, and to show how the course of the struggle is bound to reveal the inherent weaknesses of the system, and compel the workers to the realisation that the system has outlived its usefulness, and therefore ought to be abolished, and that finally the Trade Unions can be made the revolutionary instrument to that end.

What part will the State machine play in all this? It can only play one part. The State machine is deliberately fashioned to serve the industrial system. The big industrialists have not the smallest objection to the wage-workers playing in the political game so long as they play according to the rules already laid down. They must not alter these rules. If any attempt is made to do so, or even threatened, the counter revolution will rear its ugly head, as it has already done in Italy, Germany and Spain.

My Comrade Judd believes the fallacious notion that it is the House of Commons which controls the State machine, whereas in the final analysis it is the financiers and big industrialists. Surely he is not so foolish as to believe, for example, that the present war could go on even for a month, without the consent and support of these worthies? Is he so innocent that he believes all the millions of pounds stated in the War Savings comes from the pockets of barbers, milkmen, dockers or road-sweepers? Does he not know that the Prudential alone took part in more that 1,000 War Savings Weeks?

Ramsay MacDonald wrote a book called The Wages Fund. It was published in 1910, and I read it. One paragraph impressed me so much that I memorised it. It ran:

"Even though a Labour Party acceded to power, and seriously attempted to ameliorate the lot of the common people, their efforts would be negatived by the power of finance."

Those words are terribly true, and the career of Ramsay stands condemned out of his own mouth.

Oh, yes, definite reforms do sometimes pass through Parliament, but they will be perfectly harmless like our Craft's Sunday Closing Bill, so far as the big bugs are concerned, and will not threaten in any way the continuance of the profit-making system. Yet obviously any real improvement in the lot of the masses would not only seriously affect the profits of the few, but would most probably make the masses ambitious of still further improvement.

It was dear old James Connolly, that potential Lenin of old Ireland, whom the State murdered, who once observed, "Who has economic control has also political control."

II. SOCIALISM NOT PARLIAMENTARISM

Professor Levy, in an article in the Spectator, December 10th, 1943, says:—

The British working-class population has always been the strongest opponent of monopoly. This is easily explainable. The purchasing power of working-class incomes depends upon the cheap prices more vitally than that of any other group in the community. Cheap prices, however, are usually considered to be safeguarded by the levelling influence of unrestricted competition. It was this consideration which always prompted Labour Leaders to oppose cartels and trusts as a matter of principle.

This may have been true in the past, but is it still true? G. D. H. Cole evidently does not think so. In his book "Great Britain in the Post-War World" he says (pages 73-74):—

Trade Unionism, even while most of its leaders continue to profess lip-service to Socialism, becomes insensibly an ally of the restrictive policies of monopoly capitalism. It is, indeed, difficult to avoid this; for it is of the essence of a bargaining Trade Unionism to take the short view and to make the best immediate bargains that it can; and clearly the best short-run bargains are to be struck by doing what the capitalists want and not by threatening them with supersession.

Here is more food for thought for the average Trade Unionist. And the more he thinks about it the sooner will he be compelled to decide whether or not he is going to permit his "leaders" to bargain him away into perpetual slavery, or whether he is going to prepare with like-minded fellow-workers to bring about the social revolution.

This reveals the real point of social struggle. There is a possibility that on the political field there may be measures passed through Parliament restricting the ramifications of monopolies. This has been done in America already, and with what result? Has it stopped them? Most decidedly not. Periodically there are all sorts of "exposures," and often by Congress Committees set up specially to investigate. What is the result? Either nil or a fine, and the monopolist can laugh and start all over again.

Nothing can stop monopoly. It is the inevitable outcome of capitalism, and the interests of monopolists lie in the direction of the deliberate creation of a shortage of commodities, for this shortage means high prices.

Often the monopolists will bribe the employees with high wages and decent working conditions. This is to the detriment of the rest of the working class by reason of higher prices, but later operates even against the better-paid workers, who also must meet a continually rising cost of living. This is what is known as "the vicious spiral," and this also is a direct outcome of the economic system.

Obviously the true interests of the common people everywhere is the creation of plenty. And never in the long and painful history of man has this been more possible than it is to-day. But before it becomes really possible the people must have free access to the land and all the means and instruments of production and distribution. And that means Socialism.

Now I contend that Socialism can never be secured through Parliament. Mere nationalisation is not Socialism, which calls for socialism—i.e., common ownership and control—and by the time this is secured the workers must be ready to organise and run industry themselves; that is if they want Socialism and not State Capitalism. The latter could only result in a complete loss of liberty, and must lead to an even worse form of slavery than provided by the present system, and would still leave the workers faced with their historic task of freeing themselves and all mankind.

At the moment I can conceive of no other institutions than the Trade Unions as being the best working-class medium for the creation of the craft and industrial guilds of to-morrow, and it is my firm conviction that it is the duty of every Socialist to help educate his fellows to this end.

In my estimation of our period of development the time has passed to bother about Parliament. Parliamentarism can only suit the financiers and the monopolists. They would greatly enjoy the working-class continuing to hope for something from it. It is like the proverbial carrot being dangled before the donkey's nose. It has worked a long time now—too long. From a working-class point of view it has been an expensive waste of time, and it has resulted in the loss to our class of many of our most brainy men—men who, if they had never embarked upon Parliamentary careers, would have been splendid evangelists for the cause of Socialism.

It is perfectly true that I have, myself, advocated 100 per cent organisation among employers (which could easily become another form of monopoly), and also higher prices. Further than this, in 1933, I placed before the Craft a plan "for the economic uplift of the Hairdressing Trade." But I can lay claim to two useful things in all this. I was aiming at getting our Craft up to the level of other professions, where it rightfully belongs, and, in the Rose Plan, I put forward machinery which I claim could have easily been turned into a Co-operative Craft Guild in the event of the dawn of Socialism. In this connection it has to be remembered that the majority of our employers are also practising hairdressers, and as such must take their place in equality with us when the great day comes, as come it will, I emphatically insist. And I feel certain that when it does come, even the employer of to-day will be considerably better off than he is now.

Talking about the Rose Plan, I was greatly intrigued by our friend Stevens' proposals in the Journal of January 8th. They looked very like additions to my own plan, of which he seems to be ignorant. I must send him a copy.

And why do I insist that Socialism is inevitable? The answer is that the only alternative is a drift towards a worse barbarism than the world has yet known, and mad as humanity is in the mass at the moment, I cannot believe it is as mad as all that, and the natural reaction from nationalist totalitarianism is surely international libertarianism.

III. TRADES UNIONS CENTRES OF WORKING CLASS RESISTANCE.

Our Comrade Judd is still unconvinced. If he remains so after this answer to a lengthy letter, I am afraid we shall have to agree to differ, and leave it at that, at least for the time being, for at the moment we can spare no more space.

Judd thinks the State machine was "evolved" by Capitalism, and not deliberately fashioned by the ruling class to serve their own ends. All right, Comrade, have it your way. That will do for me just as well. He thinks that machine, plus the secret ballot, gives us democracy. He forgets the inequalities of the constituencies; one, for example, the fact that it is possible for one candidate to be elected with 2,000 votes, whilst in another constituency a man can be defeated with 20,000 votes. And can he not see there can be no real democracy without economic equality?

Our Comrade urges that before we can have Socialism "the material conditions must be ripe; that is to say, the problem of producing food, clothing and shelter has been solved. Capitalism is solving that problem." It seems to me Capitalism has long since solved that problem. Capitalism continues to struggle along to-day by creating deliberate scarcity. That is why I contend it has already outlived its usefulness. He argues correctly that we cannot have Socialism until the majority of the people are Socialists, because it involves the co-operation of the people themselves, and later points out that the membership of the unions are chiefly Labourites, Liberals, Tories, "Communists," and even Fascists, with only a few Socialists. He fails to realise that these will some day become Socialists from necessity, equally with those outside the Unions. Our task is to help them to understand. It is necessary for us to have a knowledge of dialectical materialism, and all the teachings of Marx and Engels, and better still, if we also have studied the teachings of Bakunin, Morris and Kropotkin. But we only waste our time and the ordinary person's time if we talk in scientific terms that the people cannot understand.

He makes a tremendous mistake if he supposes the only real Socialists are those who belong to his own particular political Party. There are good Socialists in some other organisations. And my own opinion is that for every one of these inside a Trade Union there are at least six unattached of varying degrees of knowledge and development, and although I know Socialists are still in the minority, they are definitely a very large minority, and wield a greater influence than might be supposed. Since our friend agrees we want a majority to get Socialism, why cannot he conceive the probability of getting a majority in the Trade Unions, and through that majority converting what is admittedly now only bargaining machinery into revolutionary machinery, and, finally, into constructive craft guilds with the job of laying the foundations of the new society.

It may interest our members to learn that my friend of nearly forty years standing, Guy Aldred, also takes the view that Comrade Judd takes about Trade Unions. He regards them as part of the system and believes they will die with the system. This is one of the very few things I cannot agree with Aldred about. My reason is that it seems to me some organisation of the workers must take over the respective industries when the change-over comes, and why shouldn't it be the Trade Unions? Why scrap the Unions for new organisations when they are quite capable of being converted?

It is perfectly true that the Unions as they exist to-day would be quite hopeless from a Socialist standpoint, but then what the Unions are is due to the mental backwardness of the majority of the membership, for these are the mere card-holders who do not attend meetings, and take little interest in their own affairs, and who almost invariably vote, when it comes to electing officers, for men whose names are known to them, whilst newer and more earnest men who might represent the crowd much better remain known only to those who are actively interested. Even to these latter some will be little known, owing to the ban placed upon them by the T.U. papers.

Such are the obstacles, but economic circumstances will force the apathetic to rouse themselves. And it can be truthfully asserted this is happening even now, for I find by experience a growing interest in current affairs which raises the hopes of an old stager to a higher level than I have experienced for many years.

Judd says about the State machine that it "is so powerfully centralised and entrenched, that to put forward the idea that Trade Unions can smash that machine is mere wishful thinking."

Well, what does he suppose a Socialist political Party with a parliamentary majority can do with it? Does he imagine that they can proceed to legislate the ruling class out of existence? If so, he has much to learn. At best they could only "nationalise" this, that or the other, and even that they could only do on terms of enormous compensation, or by offering stockholders guarantees of annual "interest" as high as or higher than they had previously realised.

I may be wrong, but it seems to me that the natural thing to happen when the psychological moment arrives for the social change-over, would be for the T.U.C. to declare itself the authority for that change-over in exactly the same way as the Workers, Soldiers and Peasants' Council did in Russia The one great difference must be that it will be the individual Unions that will take over the respective industries in the interests of the community, with the result we shall indulge in as much decentralisation as possible, and the T.U.C. itself will act only as a co-ordinating institution.

But, as I have said before, we cannot determine for posterity what they will do, but there is no harm in discussing what it would be best for them to do, for our discussions now are bound to have an influence on the future. Of one thing I am certain, and that is that sending good Socialist working-men to Parliament is a wicked waste of time and money, and serves only to give them careers at our expense, and results in the ultimate loss of men who would otherwise be excellent evangelists for the Socialist cause. Men like Fred Jowett (who died on his 80th birthday) who have come through a Parliamentary career unsullied are few and far between.

JESUS AND HUMANISM

STUDY CIRCLE ADDRESS IMPRESSIONS

Guy Aldred addressed an audience of about a hundred at the second Sunday morning meeting on the Study Circle's February calendar. He chose a very fitting subject for the occasion and one which he has studied well and deeply. "Jesus and Humanism" was the title.

Aldred remarked at the offset that the subject was too vast to do justice to within the time allotted to him.

He sketched the background of his subject bringing in Erasmus, the brilliant Dutch scholar and his connection with the early Humanist movement. Then he came back and dealt with Jesus and the New Testament. Many Freethinkers with whom he came in contact, he said, argued that Jesus was a myth. He disagreed with this and showed that the teaching and actions of Jesus make a very consistent whole; he was a revolutionary with a distinct human ethic.

He was opposed to the traditional morality of his day and spoke to the people in spontaneous, simple and powerfully sincere language. Unlike most of our so-called revolutionaries, Jesus did not appeal to the passions of his audiences and consistently opposed racialism while preaching the philosophy of the Brotherhood of Man.

Aldred explained how he, when young, was advised to study 18th century theological literature which he contended merely served to cramp the human mind in mysticism. He showed that we ought not to fuss over what started the world or what now sustains it. "Let us rediscover the true teachings and humanist message of Jesus and throw it out in our own lives for the reconstruction of a better society."

The early Christians were not wrong, the speaker thought. Freethinkers and the Church did not understand them. They were healthy vital people inspired by the genuine revolutionary fervour of Jesus, the living man, not the deity or myth-man of post-mortem creation, and they were wonderful agitators. Their greatness as agitators proceeded from their integrity.

To-day, the heretics and humanists in the modern Christian world should follow their excellent example and express complete contempt for racial differences; complete contempt for State subservience and complete contempt for Caesarism.

Aldred ended his address by stating that he believed there was in the Humanist philosophy a basis of understanding for unity and co-operation despite our own personal ideas of God, two Gods, three Gods or no God at all. The question or questions of Theism ought not to divide mankind into rival factions or cults any longer.

We would do well to study the message propounded by the human and humane Jesus, a message that advocated the assertion of human rights and personality within a sane, just system of society, where power for evil wielded by politicians, statesmen and diplomats would be gone for ever.

In the discussion the speaker was allowed to come to grips with the humanist message of Jesus in relation to Socialism and politics.

One contributor doubted the authenticy of Jesus and disclaimed any originality in his teachings, while pointing out that Bhudda had anticipated that message 500 years before. He remarked on Jesus' lack of economic understanding and contended that he could find no inspiration from Jesus and was compelled to leave him entirely out of his life as a guiding factor.

In reply, Aldred argued it was difficult to find where originality began and cited scientific discoveries which were claimed from different parts of the world at the same time.

He contended that Jesus was much superior to Bhudda in that Jesus made his actions compatible with his words. "Action," Aldred said "lends originality and truth to words."

Regarding the question of Jesus' economics the speaker had examined them in the light of his own understanding of Communism and found them sound indeed, and simple. He quoted the parable of the vineyard to support that.

On the point of whether we could take inspiration or guidance from Jesus, Aldred claimed that if Jesus had failed it was not because of his teachings but because we—Atheists, Christians, Socialists, Communists and Anarchists alike—had failed fully to appreciate those teachings which argued, clearly and powerfully, a sound humanist ethic and economic wisdom.

Guy Aldred's address was a dignified challenge on the one hand to the bigoted Freethinker who shuts his mind to the Humanist message of Jesus because he was identified with the God idea, and on the other hand to the dull orthodox professing Christian, who assumes that a mere formal declaration of faith in Christ and God is sufficient to establish the Kingdom of Heaven, or Good, upon earth.

I imagined that it came as a surprise to many in that audience, with its notable absence of young people, to hear such a beautiful worded picture of, and tribute to, the life of Jesus evolved in such clear accents by a militant Atheist and revolutionary Socialist.

WAR COMMENTARY CASE

[" The War Commentary " case came into Court first on Friday, March 9. Reports of the first day's hearing appeared in the " Daily Mirror " and " War Commentary " (Stop Press Edition) on March 10. The accused were represented by a solicitor. We arranged to receive a full report from the Press Association for publication so that the facts could be put before our readers. Below we publish the report of the second Police Court hearing, on Friday, March 16.—Ed.]

Four on Documents Charge

" Press Association " Report

The documents case in which a woman and three men are charged with being in possession or control of documents, dissemination of which would be likely to cause disaffection among persons in the services again came before Mr. Ivan Snell at Marylebone, on Friday, March 16.

The defendants are described as Dr. John Christopher Hewetson, 32, of Willow Road, Hampstead, casualty officer at Paddington Hospital; Vernon Richards, 29, civil engineer, at Eton Place, and Philip Richard Sansom, 28, commercial artist, Camden Studios, Camden Street, N.W.1.

Mr. Anthony Hawke (prosecuting) stated at the previous hearing that Mr. Richards was the registered proprietor of a printing business in Whitechapel, High Street, called Express Printers. Mrs. Richards was, he supposed, the manageress. Dr. Hewetson carried on a publishing business at Belsize Road, Hampstead, called Freedom Press, which published and Express printers printed, a paper called " War Commentary," described as the official organ of the Anarchist Movement.

Mr. Hawke contended that an article in " War Commentary " indicated that any person who had a rifle should hold on to it to enforce any opinion which he might hold on the rest of the community. " It seems to be issued for the purpose of causing disaffection," he commented.

Among those who watched to-day's proceedings was Colonel de Chair, Deputy Assistant Commissioner, No. 2 District, Metropolitan Police.

Ernest George Ovenden, managing clerk of a firm of solicitors for the trustees of the Eyre Estate, said that Dr. Hewetson was the tenant of the upper part of the house at Belsize Road, which was part of the Estate. No rent had been paid since Michaelmas, 1944.

" A cheque was sent, but I returned it," Mr. Ovenden said.

Asked why, Mr. Ovenden said the cheque was drawn by " V. Richards." It was discovered that there had been a breach of covenant.

Mr. Gerald Rutledge, defending, asked, " What was the breach of covenant? "

Mr. Ovenden: " The use of the premises for business."

Detective Inspector Hoare, of New Scotland Yard, gave evidence of searching the premises at Willow Road, on December 12, and finding a considerable number of documents. " Dr. Hewetson opened the door," the Inspector said.

The Inspector handed in a complete copy of a circular letter, dated October 25, 1944, and a second copy completed only on one side which, he said, he found on the premises. He also conducted a search at the Camden Studio premises. Among the documents there were 19 completed copies of the circular and 14 empty envelopes addressed to members of the Armed Forces.

Mr. Rutledge: " When you made the search on December 12 was it specifically for the purpose of finding the copies of ' War Commentary ' and the circular letter " ?—" That was the main object, but it was not the only point."

" What else were you looking for? "—" Anything that might have any bearing on the case."

" I am instructed that you took away a considerable amount of private literature of Dr. Hewetson's, consisting of notes of private patients," said Mr. Rutledge.

Inspector Hoare: " Probably a few among the stuff taken. I saw Dr. Hewetson and told him I wished to do the search with as little inconvenience as possible to him and he seemed perfectly satisfied."

" Did you think you were putting him to a great deal of inconvenience by taking these notes? "—" No, because it would have meant keeping him up all night to look through his papers."

Detective Inspector William Whitehead, of New Scotland Yard, said Mr. and Mrs. Richards and other people were present during the search. He asked Richards what was his connection with Freedom Press, and he replied: " As you saw when you came in, we all help here, but I call myself the Secretary."

He found a list of 95 names of members of the forces, with their Units. Of the 95, 77 were in the fighting services, and the remainder in non-combatant corps.

Sansom was asked about documents found at his address and replied, said Inspector Whitehead: " It is obvious if you found them that I took them there. I have duplicated similar letters for the Freedom Press, though I cannot identify these particular ones I used to do a certain amount of despatching for the Freedom Press, and probably these are a few of the circular letters which were left over."

When the evidence for the Prosecution was concluded Mr. Rutledge submitted that there was no case to answer by the defendants, particularly Mrs. Richards who, he said, was at most an employee. Whatever documents were sent out from the Freedom Press was sent under contract to subscribers of " War Commentary."

Mr. Snell decided that there was a case to go for trial, and ordered a formal week's remand prior to committal to the Old Bailey.

Mr. Rutledge said that all the defendants pleaded Not Guilty and reserved their defence.

Mr. and Mrs. Richards and Dr. Hewetson were again allowed bail, each on their own recognisances of £100 and one surety of £100.

Applying for bail for Sansom, Mr. Rutledge stated that an application was made before a Judge in Chambers this morning and no order was made, it being left to Mr. Snell to decide.

The Magistrate asked if the police would be satisfied if a proposed surety was prepared to put himself in a position to have £500 estreated if Sansom did not appear. Inspector Whitehead said the police would be satisfied.

A young man who said he was prepared to stand bail affirmed when standing surety. He gave his name as Simon John Watson Taylor, with an address at Petty France, S.W.1, and described himself as a professional actor.

Mr. Rutledge told the magistrate that Sansom would stay with Dr. Hewetson.

Vernon Richards; Marie Louis Richards; John Christopher Hewetson; and Philip Richard Sansom, were at Marylebone Police Court, London, on Friday, March 23, sent for trial at the Old Bailey on charges under the defence regulations of conspiring together, and with others, at 27 Belsize-road, Hampstead, and elsewhere to endeavour to seduce from their duties persons in the Forces and to cause disaffection among them likely to lead to breaches of duty and with having in their possession, or control, a circular letter the dissemination of copies of which among persons in His Majesty's service would contravene the defence regulations.

Dr. Hewetson and Mr. and Mrs. Richards were also sent for trial on a charge of endeavouring to cause disaffection among persons in His Majecty's service.

All were allowed bail in one surety in £100, except Sansom, whose bail was fixed at £500.

BOOK REVIEWS
BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Peace News, Ltd., 3 Blackstock Road, London, N.4, has recently produced two short pamphlets of outstanding merit. " Were we to blame too?" by Frank Hancock, 1d, contains many admirable quotations. Only one adverse criticism can be made. It should have appeared five years ago!

" Towards Understanding Japan," 1d, is most informative and very balanced. The author is not a pacifist, and the only weak spot in the pamphlet is his professed belief in the desirability of inflicting a complete defeat on Japan to ensure that the military party shall so lose face that it will never come back. He overlooks the fact that, the present Allied leaders being the kind of men they are, the complete defeat of Japan will be followed by terms so harsh and unstatesmanlike that, if they are not altered, the rise of a new military party to throw off an intolerable burden will be absolutely certain.

" Christian Values and the Settlement of the Minorities Problem," by Karlin Capper-Johnson, a 6d. pamphlet issued by the Friends Peace Committee, Friends House, Euston Road, London, N.W.1, contains a thoughtful criticism of the barbarous and stupid proposal that large numbers of Poles and Germans should be removed from their homes, in a clumsy attempt to avoid the problems created by racial minorities.

It is shown, factually, that such ventures in the past have been attended with scant success, and that the supposed value of a transfer of populations between Greece and Turkey, has not only been much exaggerated but that conditions are by no means parallel.

The author of the pamphlet observes, very pertinently, that the expulsion of a minority, i.e. the Jews, was precisely the action for which Hitler has been so strongly criticised, and now we find his enemies and judges embarking upon a policy identical with that which they so strongly condemned.

It is pointed out that there is no solution to racial problems save an arrangement which leaves law-abiding citizens in their own homes and gives them adequate and equal rights in every direction regardless of nationality.

Mr. W. H. Marwick's pamphlet " The Social and Political Witness of Christianity," price 9d., obtainable from Friends House, Euston Road, N.W.1., contains an interesting historical survey of the Church's relation to the question of social reform. Mr. Marwick himself is, incidentally, one of those who hold that true Christianity should enter into every phase of human existence, and that the dividing line between worldly and spiritual things has often been wrongly drawn. The survey, though I have no reason to question its accuracy, contains a rather sad record of widespread failure accompanied by somewhat limited success. Starting by being mistakenly other-worldly in its early days, the Church, as a whole, later degenerated into most unedifying compromise with the world—a compromise which it retains at the present time. Only a small minority of Christians down the centuries tried to remain faithful to a more enlightened way of living, and even their witness was too often marred by shortcomings of one kind and another and by narrow-mindedness. Mr. Marwick's apt summary of the position in his concluding paragraphs is worth quoting :—

" There is little to be learned from the past as to the right social attitude of the Church; we need not resort to the Middle Ages for our economics any more than our theology . . . We may say that such progressive outlook as there has been is not that of the Church, which has confined itself to platitudinous theorising, slavery and unemployment. It is rather that of the sects, or indeed of isolated heretics; while progressive activities have been, in the main, those of despised and persecuted groups . . . The Christian social order ever cherished by the true " apostolical succession of the faithful," has to be thought out again and experimented with afresh by succeeding generations within their respective environments . . . It may be that out of the very agony and despair of our times this spirit will again manifest itself in fullness and power, and transform our society. The Christian solution for our day seems to be to substitute for the conflict of isolated individuals, or their subordination to an abstract entity such as the State (which means in practice to a governing class), the voluntary co-operation of free personalities. Freedom in the fellowship of service to one another is the purpose of God for men on earth."

WORLD GOVERNMENT FOR PEACE—HOW?

In Canada early last December world government became, for the first time anywhere, a plank in the platform of a major political party. Canada's Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, convening in Montreal, voted this clause for its election manifesto:

Future wars cannot be avoided without the establishment of government at the international level, democratically representative of all the peoples great and small, and endowed with the paramount powers necessary to maintain the peace and to provide economic justice and equality of opportunity among the peoples of the world.

The C.C.F. Convention also passed the following resolution:—

Whereas alliances, the League of Nations, and the attempts to maintain the balance of power have failed to preserve world peace; be it resolved that the Canadian Government should take the initiative in promoting the idea of an international government representative of all the peoples, and work towards the establishment of a world authority which shall have jurisdiction over:

(a) Vital natural resources and their utilization for the benefit of all the peoples.
(b) International labor standards.
(c) World currency and the organization of international trade and investment.
(d) The establishment of minimum international standards of education.
(e) The administration of backward areas with a view to educating them for self-government as soons as possible.
(f) An international police force for the purpose of the enforcement of international law.
(g) World postal and communicating systems.

We are somewhat suspicious of (e), and (f) gives no guarantee of international disarmament. Without the surrender of the concept of national sovereignties, and the citizenship by birth or adoption of states, that is the political idea of subjects, there can be no world citizenship and no genuine international police force. The Duke of Bedford deals with this issue very well in his discussions of the peace issue in the future world.

Born in 1932, the C.C.F. is in control of one provincial government (Saskatchewan), where 39-year-old C.C.F.-er T. C. Douglas is Premier and the party holds 47 of 52 legislative seats), and forms the official opposition in two others (British Columbia, 16 of 48 seats; Ontario, 34 of 90 seats). It has the third largest representation in the Canadian National Parliament. The C.C.F. is bound to become, soon, at least, the official opposition. World government discussion and the question of peace is assured of a prominent place in Canadian political discussion. But the economic issue must be faced also. Politics turn on economics. The C.C.F. is aware of this fact, for it has a farmer-labour backing and, however opportunistic its policies, declares that its aims are Socialist.

In mid-December, 1944, a six-point Declaration of Human Rights, signed by 1326 distinguished Americans of all faiths, was made public by the American Jewish Committee. It first called for an "International Bill of Rights . . . to guarantee for every man, woman and child, of every race and creed and in every country, the fundamental rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." As a second point, the statement declared: "No plea of sovereignty shall ever again be allowed to permit any nation to deprive those within its borders of these fundamental rights on the claim that these are matters of internal concern."

The statement was reported to have the President's "full sympathy" and was signed by the then Vice-President Wallace, Gov. Dewey, Supreme Court Justices Roberts and Murphy, the late Alfred Smith, John W. Davis, William Green, Philip Murray, Sidney Hillman, Bishops William Manning and Francis McIntyre, and many other notables in all walks of life.

The President of the American Jewish Committee, former Justice Joseph M. Proskauer, said in issuing the Declaration: "It is a statement of general principles, not the formulation of . . . machinery. . . ."

"Every race and creed" surely includes the Negro as well as the Jew. What are the signers of this declaration doing for the Negro?

The failure to formulate machinery was the defect in the Declaration—it failed to point out how its common-sense ends of simple justice might be achieved. It failed to remark, as the American Declaration of Independence does so cogently, "that to secure these rights (life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness) governments are instituted among men."

We suggest that most of its signers obviously failed to recognise that the only way its guarantee of world citizenship and immediate local citizenship of use and practice and enjoyment could be made effective was through supra-national or world government exercising direct authority over (and controlled individually by) citizens in all countries.

How is world citizenship to be established?

The Earl of Huntingdon, in the House of Lords, October 11, 1944, said:—

There is only one device which has been found efficacious in stopping war between communities and it is along that line that I suggest, though I may be in a minority of one, the possibilities should be explored. The only device which so far has worked is that of federation . . . It is not easy to establish; it is extremely difficult.

We must remember that in the United States of America there was a very calamitous war before finally all the States of the Union settled down and federation was consolidated. But as a result there is no danger at all of war breaking out between these States. There is no prospect of war between Nevada and Idaho or between Massachusetts and Maine. The idea of it, to any American, would be ridiculous.

In the same way wherever States have federated, or in other words, have given up their sovereignty, as in the case of the Soviet Socialist Republics, the Swiss Republic and the commonwealth of Australia, or the United States of Mexico, the danger of war between those States has been eliminated. But you must have real union, and no closed frontiers; both peoples and goods must be able to pass freely; and supreme force must lie in the hands of the Central Federal Government which must be representative of all the States.

The Earl of Huntingdon did not need to be in a minority of one. He could have supported the pleas for peace and conscience made by the Duke of Bedford and so have formed a natural alliance.

Federal News (London), November, 1944, said:

A league is an organization of governments. A federation is an organization of peoples. A confederation is a league under another name.

The governing body of a league is an assembly of government delegations. It has no executive power. All its decisions have to be ratified by the separate governments of the member states. The governing body of a federation is a parliament elected by the federating peoples, to which they have handed over certain functions of government. . . . It has executive authority in its own sphere.

The representatives of the states at the league assembly, because they represent their governments, think nationally and act as national blocs. The members elected by the federating peoples to the federal parliament come from all parties in their states. As a result like-minded members from all countries come together and form federal parties. The divisions in the federal parliament are therefore political, not national, divisions. . . .

A league has no contact with the citizens of the member states. A federation has direct jurisdiction over them, since every citizen of a federating state is also a citizen of the federation.

This is excellent defining. It is a pity that those who support the policy of Federal News don't think a little more in the terms of such internationalism and a little less in the terms of power politics.

The New Yorker, December 9, 1944, in "The Talk of the Town," stated:

There is now a demand that Nazi leaders be "tried and punished" for all crimes back as far as 1933. Yet the cold truth is there is not a Nazi living who can be tried or brought to justice for anything he has done, because we have no justice to bring him to. To talk of justice as though it were something you pull out of a hat, as occasion requires, is to talk idly and badly. When a German officer tortures and butchers the innocent people of a village, he can be caught and shot by a firing squad (and we trust he will), but he cannot be brought to justice.

The only way you can try and punish an individual who has committed an anti-social act on international level is by setting up shop on that level, creating the courts on that level, writing the laws on that level, and supporting the enforement on that level. Whether people want to set up shop on that level, whether people are capable of it, whether it is wise to attempt it—these are questions still unanswered by the democratic nations. Our private hope is that the answer will be Yes, but until the people make up their minds they ought to keep the record clean and not kid themselves about jurisdiction and crime. You can't have your anarchical society and eat it too.

Forgiving the use of the term "anarchy" to mean chaos, which it does not, this comment contains truth. The idea of punishing Germans is merely the old theory of "spoils to the victor." It is gangster politics, not democracy.

SOCIALISM IN U.S.A.

WHAT THE UNITED SOCIALIST MOVEMENT SEEKS TO ESTABLISH.

The following statement of aims and purposes will be accepted by all who call themselves Socialists. It is a declaration of what the members of the United Socialist Movement stand for.

Knowing that social, political, and economic equality is necessary to the development of human personality, the Socialist wants to remove class distinctions of all kinds.

There can be no "upper and lower classes," no rich and poor, under Socialism. Socialism implies a classless Society where none have privileges and where ALL have equal status, equal rights and equal opportunities.

The Socialist maintains that Labour is honourable service to the community and must cease from being bought or sold or exploited.

In the common interest the Socialist seeks to establish the social ownership and control of natural resources, substituting for their exploitation for private gain the organisation of their use as a public service to satisfy human needs.

By social control and workshop planning and administration, the practical democratic industrial organisation of wealth production and distribution, the Socialist seeks to make an end to present-day suffering from poverty. He would remove insecurity in all its forms from every home. He seeks to increase the actual personal, or "consumptive" property of every human being.

The Socialist aims to enlarge human freedom. He repudiates every form of coercion and dictated rule. Socialism is democracy and has freedom for its aim and liberty its working political method. The Socialist desires to effect a revolutionary change in society by the authority of a consenting and informed public opinion. Socialism objects to hereditary and to self-selected rulers alike.

Socialism is Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity in actual practice as the established order of life in a civilised community.

The United Socialist Movement is opposed to all capitalist war and militarism. It is opposed to those who would turn the class struggle within society, and within every nation, into a national struggle between nations. The United Socialist Movement is at once a revolutionary and an anti-militarist organisation. Its history dates back to 1906, and it represents a direct record of struggle for the ideals of human well-being.

If you accept this programme, join the United Socialist Movement. Found a group in your district. Become a member at large. If you live in New York contact local "Word" readers.

I have read the statement of the principles and aims of the United Socialist Movement, and I desire to become a National Member, until such time as a group is organised in my district, or a local organisation federates to the main body.

The Passing of Arthur Symons

By C. H. NORMAN

The death of Arthur Symons gives an opportunity to express gratitude to one of the leaders against the humbug and hypocrisy prevailing in Britain in the last decade of the Victorian era. He was a contributor to the first number of "The Yellow Book," a brilliantly-written and conceived magazine, which is unique in having had the whole of its thirteen numbers reprinted years after. How freshly its pages read to-day nearly fifty years later! Symons then founded "The Savoy," whose appearance caused an almost greater uproar among the conventional moralists of the press as did "The Yellow Book."

Symons was a fine poet. His little book "London Nights" produced an explosion which has hardly ever been equalled in absurdity of denunciation (except in the case of the attacks on Ibsen's plays) on the ground of its "immorality." Symons retorted on his critics with a brilliant defence in the Preface to the Second Edition, which contains a passage the truth of which is well-known to anyone who has the slightest knowledge of the history of human manners and morals. "For the principles of art are eternal, while the principles of morality fluctuate with the spiritual ebb and flow of the ages. Show me any commandment of the traditional code of morals which you are at present obeying and I will show you its opposite among the commandments of some other code of morals, which your forefathers once obeyed; or, if you prefer, some righteous instance of its breaking, which you will commend in spite of yourself."

This passage should be considered by those who excuse the crimes they are committing to-day on the ground that they are directed by the State, through its minions, who are all the same in this regard, whether their name happens to be Churchill, Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin, or Roosevelt; because they all bear the brand of a common iniquity.

The last number of "The Savoy" was remarkable in the circumstance that the whole of the literary matter was written by Arthur Symons, while the drawings were all executed by that fine draughtsman and artist in line, Aubrey Beardsley. The versatility of Symons' literary capacity may be seen in the nature of those contributions. There is a long poem, "Mundi Victima" (Victims of the World), a magnificent essay in appreciation of Walter Pater, which has never been equalled, a story entitled "The Childhood of Lucy Newcome," a travel essay on "The Isles of Arran," a translation from Mallamé, and a literary causerie at the end. It is an extraordinary production, marked by a care and choice of words, which is both simple and exquisite in balance.

In "The Symbolist Movement in Literature," Symons was the means of introducing to English thought some little known French writers, including the visionary, Villiers de Lisle Adam, whose "La Eve Future" has proved such a true forecast of the mechanisation of women, begun in industrial England, and completed under the Imperialist "Communism" of Stalin and now spreading throughout the world like a pestilence. No grimmer danger signal has been hoisted for the future of humanity. It may be the privilege of women to change their minds, but it is certainly the practice of men; as cannot be better shown than the destruction of family life (that Victorian sanctity) in the course of this war, with the moral corruption which has resulted in all walks of life.

Symons maintained a high standard of artistic and intellectual integrity during his life. He paid great care to avoid vulgarity in style or method of writing. His own view of worldly success in matters artistic is well-expressed in his short note on the death of Millais, the painter, who produced such strangely differing work in quality of artistic principle as "The Eve of St. Agnes," and "Bubbles"! Symons, after paying tribute to the nobility of conception of Millais' early work in these words: "He had the prodigal energy of genius, and painted pictures because he was born to paint pictures," proceeded, after mentioning the adulatory absurdities of the obituary notices thus: "My thoughts have turned, as I read these commendations of the good citizen, so English, so sporting, whose private virtues were so undeniably British, to a painter, also a man of genius whose virtues were all given up to his art, and who is now living in a destitute and unhonoured obscurity. It has seemed to me that there, in that immaculate devotion to art, I find the true morality of the artist; while in the respectability of Millais I see nothing to honour, for its observance of the letter I take to have been a desecration of the spirit."

The present generation owes much to that band of men, who organised themselves under the standard of "The Yellow Book," to undermine the humbug and hypocrisy of their era. They were successful to a certain extent, heavy though the task was, in destroying the smugness of Victorianism. Unfortunately, their good work was hindered by the Boer War and the resultant vulgar Imperialism, which set the train for the explosion of 1914-1918, in its turn, producing the grotesque obscenity of the death and destruction of to-day. It is well that one should not permit the evil tumult of war to drown completely the voice of culture and enlightenment in the arts. So one should record one's appreciation of a man whose standard of work in artistic matters and whose faith in the encouragement of ideas were a model for adoption and appreciation in the humanities.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I must write to thank you very deeply for sending me the book, "A Call to Manhood."

I do not go about very much in the ordinary way but I always try to be present at public meetings for peace such as organised by the P.P.U., etc. Both my brothers were C.O.'s in the last war and after a period in Wormwood Scrubbs prison, spent many months at Home Office Camps, the first one being at Kiddington in Suffolk where C. H. Norman, who writes in your paper, was also in captivity. When I visited my brothers there, along with my Mother, we were introduced to Mr. Norman.

I hope it may be possible for me to hear you speak one of these days. I have known the name of Guy Aldred for more than twenty-five years I am sure. My brothers used to bring home papers of all kinds and I remember seeing your name from time to time but I do not remember just what the papers were called. Also I remember the name of Rose Witcop Aldred.

Again thanking you.

Yours sincerely,

DOROTHY HAMMOND.

Birmingham.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—You might be interested to know that I have before me, as I write, a copy of "The Spur," dated August, 1916. It is a very interesting issue and as suitable to the present conditions as the last copy of "The Word."

Wishing you every success in your efforts to spread a humanist attitude towards life in place of the brutal and callous attitude of modern society.

Best wishes. Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR TURTLE.

Leigh, Lancs.

My Dear Comrade Guy Aldred,—Words are inadequate to express my deepest appreciation for the very challenging pamphlet of "Letters to the Editor" you recently sent me. I have read them with a sense of new inspiration and courage.

I have read a few copies of "The Word" and found it also most challenging, clean and good.

It seems to me more hypocrisy is being shown to-day than on any Christmas Day in the past, as people still sing and talk about this "Christ, the Prince of Peace," and still fight and kill.

God bless you in your great work, is my prayer.

Sincerely,

ASHTON JAMES.

Atlanta, Ga., U.S.A., Christmas Day, 1944.

Dear Comrade,—I feel for this man, who is loyal to his fellow workers, and to the reason for which he joined the army.

Could you take this up, and see that justice is done? I make the extract from "Reynolds News" for Feb. 4, 1945:—

A SOLDIER'S CONSCIENCE.

Private A. Lambert (44) of the Pioneer Corps, a Swansea dock worker in civil life, who has been sentenced by a Field General Court Martial at Longmoor, Hants, to 16 months detention, said during his trial that his conscience did not allow him to help break a Cardiff Dock strike last November.

He was charged with being absent without leave. Lambert said he had just taken part in the Manchester Gas strike and rather than do anything against his fellow dockers he went to stay with friends until the strike was over.

Asked why he had not talked the matter over first, he replied: "It would be useless to discuss my conscience with the Commanding Officer."

Yours faithfully,

BEN QUARMBY.

Manchester, Feb. 9, 1945.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—So "The Word" is to be increased to 3d. I know what all this must mean to you and you have my sympathy. That your struggles and endeavours should be rewarded in this fashion is something awful.

Workers in their millions readily subscribe their pennies to the sensational "Daily Liar," but they don't seem to care two hoots for the papers that write for and to them.

What a crazy world! What a class!—without nerve, without will, without courage, without solidarity! What a hope!

The enclosed is a modest donation towards the Deficit Fund, and, I hope, a means of encouragement, which is the food that gives energy to the thought and struggle.

With best thoughts.

Fraternally,

STEPHEN MARLETTA.

Greenock, February, 1945.

Dear Comrade Aldred, Enclosed please find yearly subscription for "The Word."

I am amazed to learn that there are any readers of "The Word" so mean as not to send their money when they have had the papers. It is one of the most interesting and helpful papers that I get. I often feel grieved that I am not able to give you substantial help in your struggle, but unfortunately my means are very limited.

I am seventy-five, but have still a long way to go to catch up to our old comrade, George Gorman. I read his letter and the verses with great interest.

I sympathize with you in the struggle you are having to keep the paper going. I never crave for money, only at times like these. I feel it would be grand if I could send you a £100, but alas it cannot be.

With kindest regards and all good wishes.

W. H. ROBERTS.

AFTER THE WAR—WHAT?

On the report stage of the Army Estimates on March 16, Conservative Members pressed upon Sir James Grigg the necessity for military conscription after the war.

In the course of his Reply to the Debate, the Minister declared that the question of compulsory service was under consideration by the War Office, who would produce a complete scheme for the post-war Army. It was not for him to make a statement before a decision had been taken.

At the Conservative Party Conference at Westminster the same day, a resolution was passed and carried by a large majority to the effect that the country could only carry out its international obligations if it remained strong and fully armed and the Government was urged to retain conscription for the Armed Force of the Crown.

ANARCHIST ACTIVITY

[The following letter speaks for itself. We believe that there is a strong need for an Anarchist or Libertarian movement in Britain. That movement, to play its part in the working class struggle, must be a genuine democratic movement, differing from the parliamentary movement in the thoroughness and efficiency of its very democracy. Propaganda under capitalism must be dominated, to some extent, by capitalist concepts; but the desire should be to overcome all capitalist considerations and establish genuine propaganda centres and means of expression as part of the revolutionary struggle. Anarchists should be men and women of example. Anarchism is actually the struggle towards Socialism through the direct action of living example and the solidarity in action such example evolves.—Ed.]

Dear Comrade,—Many have asked me why I do not continue my writings in "War Commentary" and why others, especially those who supplied news of strike action, have also discontinued writing for that paper. I have made many friends (and opponents) by my signed articles and by "Red and Black Notebook," which I wrote under the penname of "Syndicalist." To many of them it doubtless seems strange that we should suddenly cease to appear in print.

We did not cease writing because we were wishful to do so. We were sacked by the boss.

To understand the sequence of events it is necessary to know, at least briefly, the history of the present Freedom Press and the Anarchist Federation in London. The Freedom Press started about sixty years ago, completely died out before the Spanish War. At the beginning of this war, in October, 1939, "War Commentary" was founded by myself and three others. Others joining, we soon formed the Anarchist Federation (largely confined to London) and, a good deal later, revived the title Freedom Press to cover the publishing activities of the A.F. It was decided, unanimously, by the A.F. members, who included all those in control of Freedom Press, that the Editorial Board of "War Commentary" and Freedom Press should be elected by the A.F., that all proposed publications should be read by the Editorial Board, but finally decided by the full meeting of the A.F. Dr. Hewetson, V. Richards and Mrs. Richards (M. L. Berneri) were among those who agreed.

Unfortunately, most of us were too trusting. We allowed Hewetson and Richards to become trustees of the movement's assets without any legal safeguard. Naturally, we did not think such things necessary in an Anarchist organisation. Money was raised to purchase printing plant and the trio secured the property rights. The same applies to Freedom Bookshop, Bristol, and to the paper license (although this was doubled by taking over "Revolt!" which, also, was the paper of a movement). We still trusted.

However, during 1944, dissatisfaction caused by the dictatorial actions of the trio, Hewetson and the Richards couple, developed within the A.F. Particularly unsatisfactory, certainly to me, were the "financial reports" given by Richards. Hurriedly read from scraps of paper (never to be handled by the members) at uncertain intervals, all the impression we received was that, whatever Freedom Press published, sold or received as gifts, we were losing money fast. But always we were promised a full report next time. We are still waiting.

In the summer of 1944 two Anarchists who had proven their worth as revolutionaries were nominated as members of the A.F. Mrs. Richards followed Churchill's example and threatened to resign if the nominations went forward. The names not being withdrawn, she resigned, but continued to exercise back door control of Freedom Press. Later, at a well attended mixed meeting, she admitted that she did "not believe in organisation." Later still she amended this to, she did "not believe in Anarchist organisation." After debating the issue for several meetings, Richards, Hewetson and four others left the A.F. meeting and formed what they termed the "Freedom Press Group."

In spite of this we all continued to work for the paper, but we still pressed for a full financial report which was promised for the first A.F. meeting in January, 1945. I went to that meeting firmly believing that no report would be given. Sure enough—no report, and no treasurer. Instead, we received a letter from Dr. Hewetson and V. Richards dismissing the Editorial Board. Like General Scobie talking to the Greeks, however, they offered us terms. We could appoint three members of an Editorial Board against their three to help them produce the paper (no control over pamphlets and books), but to qualify we must sell 500 copies of each issue of "War Commentary"; and this arrangement must cease with the end of the War!

Naturally, we rejected these "terms."

In any case we knew, by experience, that the real control would be in the hands of Mrs. Richards (M. L. Berneri) and we were as sick of her peculiar methods of doing business as we were of her juvenile comments on the social problem. For myself, I have always stated that the editorial, or any other, committee of a movement should be elected by the membership of that movement and subject to recall at twenty-four hours notice by those who elected them.

So, there it is.

"War Commentary," Express Printers and Freedom Press have been taken from the movement, are now private property, controlled by three persons, assisted by a few hand picked and completely servile stooges.

"Common Ownership of the means of production," "Workers' Control," "Recall of Delegates," "Down with the Communist and Trade Union Bureaucracy." "Read 'War Commentary.'"

I am an industrial worker and during my five years as co-editor of "War Commentary," I struggled to make the paper a reflection and expression of the workers' struggle. Aided by other comrades, who also have been excluded from the paper, we have achieved that end. I was never openly opposed, but I incurred the hatred of the middle class persons now in control. As Hewetson openly stated, in referring to an anticipated period of intense class struggle, they "wanted to publish books on art and sex morality."

Two or three years ago, a young fellow was expelled from the London A.F. for stealing some postal orders from Freedom Press. I close with this reflection—by that standard, what should be the reward of those who take, not a few postal orders, but the whole outfit—press, paper, finance, goodwill established by the loyalty and struggle of the comrades, as well as the name of the movement.

Yours fraternally,
TOM BROWN,

BOISE VALLEY APPEAL

Readers of "The Word,"

Friends,—I might begin this word to you with a review of everything that has occurred in the case of the Washington Post Office and Justice Departments against the "Boise Valley Herald" since September 3rd, 1944. But most of that has been published in "The Word."

There are some important phases of the struggle of which we have made little or no mention. For example, promptly, with the broadcast of the charges by the U.S. authorities, that our mailing rights and privileges had been suspended, every commercial advertiser declined to patronize the paper longer and the insurance company which for years had carried our risk notified us that it was cancelling the same and returning to us the value of the period that had been paid for. By much hunting and greatly increased rate we finally got another company to carry the risk. All this has meant a burden and a struggle which few papers in the whole history of this land of the "free" and home of the brave have had the determination or the nerve or whatever you might call it, to struggle with, and sweat under.

It has been said that sincerity is proven by one's disposition to put his preaching into practice in the face of strong opposition and difficulty. The highest compliment the "Boise Valley Herald" has received for many a moon was one recently written to us by Edward Holton James, when he wrote me that so far as he knew, the "Boise Valley Herald" was the only liberal paper in the entire country that has not permitted itself to be browbeaten.

I have long believed that the most vital civic work I can do is to fulfil the thought patterns of freedom of speech and of the press in the real flesh and-blood way of publishing a little village paper. The civic responsibility that rests upon the publicist is to be true to the facts and to accord to the other party of his comment the opportunity to correct errors of fact and of reasoning. The good sense—the conscience—of the community will do the rest.

Readers of the "B. V. Herald" who have followed our course throughout our connection with it, and who recall the threats, assaults—both physical and journalistic and the unpleasantness of which we were made the focus because of our connection with the summary-removal of the County Sheriff and the libel suits and other disturbances in which local office-holders and attorneys and their press bureaucrats, know that ours has by no means been the path of commercial appeasement that, in our opinion, constitutes the root-cause of the betrayal of Constitutional government.

Upon the advice of the Civil Liberties Union who represented us in the "star-chamber" hearing in Washington—a hearing that was merely a counterfeit for the "due process of law" guaranteed to even the worst of criminals—we regularly applied for the second-class mailing privilege. We did not permit ourselves to be hopped up with any likelihood that it would be granted, despite the fact that Congressman Compton I. White interceded in our behalf and advised us that the chances were good. I gave no promise that our editorial policy would conform to the win-the-war unity that they demanded of us. Our contention was, and is, that opponents of a war policy have the same right of expression when a war is under way as is accorded to the proponents of the resort to war exercised when we are supposed to be at peace. My resolve is that so long as I have physical liberty I will use the spiritual liberty that the Bill of Rights insures to those who prove their worthiness to have rights.

There is one thing, however, that can be rightfully demanded of any paper and that is that it be allowed to retain only those on its mailing list who think enough of it to pay its subscription price. I had hoped to be able to make a personal campaign for renewals and new subscriptions within a radius of the Boise Valley, but under present conditions, that is impossible. For this reason I am taking this means of contacting you in the hopes that you will help me make a good showing to the Post Office Department, by extending the B.V.H. influence well beyond the valley. The annual subscription is one dollar, anywhere.

With best wishes,

NOTES AND COMMENTS
BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The American Paper, "The Progressive," contains in its issue of February 5, a vigorous attack on the evil and undemocratic practice of concluding secret treaties, which has done, and is doing, so much to destroy the peace of the world. Readers are reminded how, after the fall of the Czar's Government, the Soviet revealed a number of selfish and disreputable secret agreements between Russia and Britain, Russia and France, Britain and France, and Britain and Italy, which were hidden away in the archives of the Foreign Office in Petrograd. The article goes on to suggest, and with all too good reason, that precisely the same policy is being pursued at the present time. It asks: "What can explain, for example, the Russian rampage in the Baltic and the Balkans, with the apparent assent of Britain, and the British onslaught in Greece, without any interference from Russia, if not a treaty conceived in letter or in spirit, assigning to each its appointed sphere of influence in post-war Europe? And what can explain the inaction of the United States in this deplorable exhibition of imperialistic power if not an agreement with the offending natons to keep hands off in return for certain concessions to its own advantage—say in the Pacific? . . . Is anything to be gained for peace and order by agreements made by selfish Powers in their own exclusive interests? What is even now being fashioned in the very midst of this armed struggle, by methods either of anarchy or of conspiracy, is the structure of a post-war world made of the rotten timbers of balances of power, spheres of influence, power politics and competitive armaments. The Third World War is being prepared before the Second World War is finished.

Nothing can save us in this crisis but open covenants, openly arrived at—covenants of peace, drawn up in common by all the United Nations, in the interest of all these nations, small as well as large, weak as well as strong. . . . There is something pitiful in the plight of a world which knows no salvation except in the plottings and plannings of a few men who chance to hold high public office—and something outrageous in the arrogance of these men in keeping to themselves all knowledge of the destiny which affects us all. Enough of these mouthings in places unknown, for purposes unconfessed, to decisions unannounced. Let these be open deliberations by representatives of the people, that a peace may be made by common consent and in the common interest, and therewith be fit, as well as able, to endure."

Another pertinent observation in the same paper runs as follows:—"We are confronted, not with the question of what Germany deserves but of what we of the rest of the world can afford. There are no dividends in dismemberment, no rewards in revenge."

Many years ago the Duke of Windsor began to display a sincere and active interest in the improvement of the lot of the poor and the unfortunate, together with an independence of mind not often encountered in Royalty, who are too ready to sing their little patriotic ditty to any tune played for them by the incompetent or scoundrelly politicians who chance to be in office at the time. When I heard recently that he had resigned the Governorship of the Bahamas, I at once suspected that some dirty work had been on foot, and an interesting article by George Padmore, in "The New Leader," has confirmed my

THE WORLD'S WORST ENEMY
The vicious circle that humanity must and can eradicate suspicions. Apparently the Duke has made more than one effort to improve the extremely bad conditions of the coloured section of the population, by raising their rates of pay; getting public works schemes started; and securing tariff reductions, in order to bring in cheaper foodstuffs. He also endeavoured to get a Secret Ballot Bill passed, and a Commission was set up, at his instigation, which recommended increased wages to meet the rise in the cost of living brought about by the war; a modest old-age pension; and better social services. It is true that the financial technique suggested for obtaining money for these purposes—increased taxation of rich Europeans and the imposition of death duties—was orthodox and stupid, but it is to be feared that the vigorous opposition which the Bahamas House of Assembly put up against these and similar proposals, was inspired by selfishness and not by a knowledge of that sane finance which could have improved the condition of the negroes without robbing the white population.

In his endeavours the Duke received no support whatever from the British Colonial Office, and at length, in disgust, he decided to give up the struggle and offer his resignation to Colonel Stanley.

"The Fledgling," the monthly bulletin of the 296 (Stoke Newington) Squadron of the A.T.C., expresses the following bloodthirsty sentiments: "We are at war with 95 per cent. of the German nation—man, woman and child. 95 per cent. of the German nation exulted in the crimes of Lidice, the sinking of the Athenia, the massacre of Warsaw and the indiscriminate bombing of London. . . . The (German) population has been, and still is, militarily-minded. For the sake of the years to come we must crush that mind." Readers of "The Word" will, of course, remember, that not a scrap of real evidence exists that the Athenia was ever sunk by a submarine; also, that any connection with the sinking was repudiated by the German Government. It is, indeed, believed by many, that the disaster was one of the I.R.A. outrages common at that time. Let us hope that before it reaches adult vulturehood, the callow, but well-named, dicky-bird quoted above, will achieve a greater measure of accuracy and common sense!

Most people are aware that elephants were employed in war in very early times. It came, however, as a surprise to me to learn, the other day, that rhinoceroses have been similarly utilised. Oliver Goldsmith, in his "History of the Earth," written in the 18th century, says: "In some parts of the kingdom of Asia, where the natives are more desirous of appearing warlike than of showing themselves brave, these animals are tamed and are led into the field to strike terror into the enemy." He adds, however: "But they are always an unmanageable and restive animal and probably more dangerous to the employers than to those they are brought to oppose." It would seem, therefore, that our politicians, when busying themselves with preparations for World War No. 3, would do well to concentrate on perfecting the inventions of civilisation, such as the rocket and the flying bomb, and not waste time over the military conscription of the rhinoceros.

"Whenever Mr. Churchill refers to it (the Atlantic Charter) he either excludes a new country from its terms, or shows, as in the Polish Debate, that he has forgotten what is in it."—Michael Foote in "Left News."

The Polish Study Group on current affairs has issued a statement to the effect that the Polish population of the United States, numbering over five millions, is, with the exception of a tiny Communist group, unanimous in its support of the Polish Government in London. They have declared that the Yalta resolutions of the Big Three are "contrary to the sacred obligations of the Atlantic Charter" and "a decisive blow dealt to the cause of freedom."

A Naval Officer writing in one of the weekly papers states that electorate forms were issued to the men on a small ship stationed in the Mediterranean. When next day they were collected, not one of them had been filled in and even when the Commanding Officer had pointed out that it was a mistake to refuse to vote, the forms remained blank. It was ascertained that the men had not sufficient confidence in any of the established Parties to make them feel that it was worth while to put them into Power. If this is characteristic of the Services as a whole, it is a healthy sign, but will the men recognise and support new and sound political leaders if, and when, these appear on the scene, and will they also realise the duty and necessity of selecting their own trustworthy politicians if they do not feel attracted by those presented to them by other agencies?

The greater part of the Greek National Debt (about one hundred million pounds) was floated in London between 1823 and 1828. This means either that British bankers created new money in Britain to finance the production, for export to Greece, of goods to the value of the sum just mentioned; or that British investors subscribed money for the same purpose. Probably both methods were used. An interest rate of over 8 per cent. was charged on this loan and about one-third of the Greek Budget had to be set aside each year to provide interest on the loan, the principal of which the Greek Government was neither permitted nor encouraged, to pay off. Even in the worst years of a depression, one-third of the real wealth of Greece had to be exported to Britain to be sold here for British money in order to pay the money-lenders their interest.

In 1944 British bondholders of the Greek National Debt presented to the British Foreign Office a memorandum asking that the exiled Greek Government should give an undertaking "to continue to safeguard the rights and securities at present enjoyed by Greek external loans and to protect the general interests of bondholders." This means that the unfortunate Greek people, struggling to recover from the economic effects of the war, will still be obliged to export to Britain large quantities of goods they badly need for themselves in order to pay further instalments which, added together, may one day amount to a much larger sum than that which was originally lent.

An interesting example of the money-lenders' racket operating in the British Empire is given in the Natal "Daily News," of December 9th, 1944. "Durban is still paying for its horse trams and the debt will not be liquidated until 1951, by which time the capital and interest will have amounted to £750,000. The interest already paid on the horse trams amounts to £430,000—twice the capital cost. Yet the city only had these trams from 1893 to 1904, approximately eleven years. The horse trams are another example of this generation paying for what it hardly even heard of, much less saw or used"—and for something into the bargain which had already been paid for more than twice over! Exactly the same thing is going on in Britain to-day with regard to continued payment for past wars that have already been paid for. It's a grand dodge to go on drawing interest on a loan the principal of which you never allow to be repaid!!

The death of Mr. Lloyd George—to give his name the simple prefix by which he will always be best known and remembered—arouses feelings very similar to those which I experienced when I heard of the death of the Archbishop of Canterbury—that is to say, a somewhat sad regret at the passing of a man of great gifts and promise whose career was, nevertheless, marred by certain fatal weaknesses. Lloyd George in his early days possessed abundant moral courage and throughout his life he was a man of acute judgment and great personal charm. Unfortunately, however, he was unable to resist the temptations of popularity and power, with the result that in later years his moral courage was apt to desert him and cause him, in a manner both tragic and deplorable, to pander to popular prejudices and refuse to take the course which in his inmost heart he must have known to be right, if he felt doubtful of the support of Parliament or of public opinion. Even in the present war, when some of us hoped that he would come out boldly in the advocacy of that negotiated peace in which he really believed, he kept on hesitating and waiting for the ideal moment which, in his judgment, never came. Nevertheless, his verdict, contained in a personal letter which he wrote me, on this senseless and useless conflict is sound and true—"This war into which we blundered without consideration and wisdom."

If President Roosevelt possessed virtues which in private life endeared him to his friends and relatives one cannot withold from them a measure of sympathy in his sudden death. Regarding the latter, however, from the standpoint of his public career, one can only say that it would have been well for the world if he had died twelve years earlier. An unimaginative diplomat, an inveterate and unscupulous warmonger, and a tool of Big Finance, it was often difficult to perceive any connection between his religious professions and his conduct of affairs.

One Easter Sunday I heard an Air Force officer sing, in church, a solo anthem: "How lovely are thy dwellings." The British are not an imaginative race.

The Weak and the Strong

In the House of Commons on March 15th, Mr. Rhys Davies (Lab., Westhoughton) asked the Prime Minister to clarify the point that, by the agreement come to at Yalta, there was no remedy if one of the Great Powers were guilty of aggression. Mr. Churchill, in his reply, said: "I am sorry there should be a high degree of axiomatic truth in the facts as stated by the Hon. Member. . . . We may deplore, if we choose, that there is a difference between great and small, between strong and weak in the world."

To the very, very strong
'Tis impossible to do wrong,
But upon the small and weak
The strong their will may wreak.

Thus at Yalta 'twas agreed
To sustain the old world creed,
Though its axiomatic truth
We may deplore, forsooth.

But betwixt the weak and strong
There can be no right or wrong,
For the weak are always wrong,
And the strong are always strong,
So abandon high ideals—
"Come toe the line—ye devils!"

"Heil Hitler!"

A REVIEWER SAYS.

Our contemporary, The Christian Century, Chicago, for February 14, reviews two Strickland Press publications as follows:—

"The Financiers' Little Game, or The Shape of Things to Come," by the Duke of Bedford. . . . A snappy pamphlet arguing that the gold standard puts everybody in the power of the bankers of "the City" and Wall Street (chiefly Wall Street, because America has most of the world's gold), opposing an international currency of any kind, and urging a currency like Irving Fisher's "commodity dollar" based on the value of a list of commodities.

"A Call to Manhood and other Studies in Social Struggle." By Guy A. Aldred. . . . Twenty-six socialist essays written, mostly as editorials, since 1906. Very strong and pungent writing.

COMMUNISM.

Readers should buy this striking exposure of "Communist" International politics, 124 pages of factual reading and study, price 1s. 6d., post-free, 1s. 9d.

Of the first edition of this work, the Evening Citizen, Glasgow, July 29, 1935, wrote:

"In For Communism . . . Mr. Aldred tells with much detail the history of the Communist and Anti-Parliamentary movement."

The Re-education of Germany

Excerpts from an Address
By Dr. RICHARD ULLMANN.

(Delivered before the London Conference of the Anglican Pacifist Fellowship, on March 10, 1945.)

All the wonderful plans for what is commonly called the "re-education" of Germany are still-born, if considered separately from the general conditions. This mistake, however, is not only made when planning future policy, but also when assessing the educational situation as created by the Nazi rule. No education of any sort can have as much influence on the average German to convince him of the fallacy of Nazism as the disasters of war, obliteration bombing, defeat and the breakdown of the Hitler system. . . . It will largely depend on Germany's fate after the war whether certain Nazi residues will regain power. On the whole, I think it is safe to say that in the early post-war years the vital educational problem in Germany will not be offered by the Nazi doctrines of the master race and belief in force, but by that frightful emptiness, that spiritual vacuum which Nazism will leave behind in the minds and hearts of most Germans: apathy, fatalism, disintegration of moral values and bewilderment at the meaning of what has happened and is happening.

After 12 years of Nazi rule, the Germans are perfectly well informed of the darker sides of British, American and Russian history, much better than the citizens of these countries themselves. They will regard attempts at an enforced education by the Allies as hypocrisy, even if it is well meant, and as means of oppression. This shows the fundamental fallacy of the idea that education is possible from outside: how can any education work if the pupil despises the educationalist as a hypocrite? . . . I doubt whether even returning refugees could give any useful lead, though some of them might be valuable assistants. . . . I am thoroughly convinced that the leading part in German education must be left to those who, together with the German nation and youth as a whole, have actually been through the series of emotional crises of these latter years and have overcome them spiritually.

CONCLUSIONS:

1. If an Allied educational authority is set up for Germany, it should as quickly as possible be transformed into an international advisory body of the kind of the I.L.O., and should then exert its influence equally in countries other than Germany.

2. If the educational aim is responsible citizenship, it cannot be imposed by orders, but must have freedom to grow spontaneously in school communities, where teachers and pupils learn not the execution of orders, but the practice of responsible co-operation.

3. If the educational aim is European or World Citizenship, it cannot be achieved under the impresson that at present the future citizen has minor rights and is an outcast or a suspect. This does not mean that after the treatment the Nazi Government has meted out to other nations in Europe no redemptive action on behalf of the Germans is necessary. But it must constitute part of that citizenship. It must not be done by compulsion but by showing to young Germans what sins have been committed in their name and by thus waking in the best among them the ardent desire to make up for those sins.

4. If the educational aim is the realisation of Christian values, it cannot be achieved on the grounds that Germany, alone, has been all wrong all the time and the others all right, but by finding a common ground in the fact that all of us are sinners and, therefore, must learn humility towards those who wronged us in the past, are wronging us now and will continue to wrong us in the future. It will be a hard way for young Germans to learn this under the conditions in store for them after this war. But if there are a few Christians in other countries who help them by accepting this humility for themselves, e.g., by going to prison as C.O.'s without protest against such wrong, or by forgiving wrongs committed, not against the French and the Poles, but against themselves, a few young Germans are sure to understand and may thus become capable of taking their cross upon them, for their own, their nation's, and Europe's redemption.

The following is extract from a letter by Richard Ullmann, written prior to his address at the London A.P.F. Conference:

"British pacifists must learn that the Anglo-German peace problem is of minor importance, though it is quite understandable that it looms so largely in their minds, not only because they are English themselves, but because the Christian starts with himself, and the democrat thinks of his own Government first, being responsible for it. But the task for peacemakers is largely a Conutinental task. All British attempts must and will fail (as once before) if the reconciliation between Germany and her ill-treated neighbours (Poland, France, Russia) is not seen as the paramount problem of international reconciliation in Europe. Everything else is just appeasement.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Comrade Aldred,—In "The Word" for April, the Duke of Bedford gives some statistics of production and incomes in America and Australia over certain periods which make very strange reading. For example, he says that during the years 1927 and 1928, Australian factories produced 116 million pounds worth of goods but distributed only 130 millions pounds in wages, salaries and dividends.

Could he explain, for the benefit of readers, how the figures were collated, the source of the information, and what steps were taken to ensure that the production and income figures were comparable since he deduces that the difference represents a dead loss in wealth to the Australian community?—Yours fraternally,

Baillieston, Glasgow, 6/4/45. J. I. CRAIG.

FREEDOM TO LIBERATED EUROPE!

This year May Day will be celebrated in what is deemed to be an almost Liberated Europe. It has not been proved that liberation means political, economic, and industrial freedom. A message will go out from this great Labour meeting to our Socialist and Libertarian comrades in Europe that the British Labour Movement, conscious of all that has to be put right in this Britain and the British Empire, will endeavour to strengthen the solidarity of International Socialism and end the reign of war and violence, should it become the Government in the coming General Election. British Labour shares in the same struggle as all European Socialist comrades for a future justice and decent conditions of living for all, irrespective of race, colour, sex, religion or language.

ARMY C.O.'s EXPERIENCE

A letter to Members of the Anglican Pacifist Fellowship from Lance-Corporal E. H. Chitty, R.A.M.C.:

Dear Fellow-Members,—As a C.O. in the Army I found myself at "D"-day a member of a Parachute Field Ambulance—in fact, one of "Britain's Brave Airborne Troops." I had enjoyed my training in a rather grim way, finding that parachute jumping was an excellent exercise for that fundamental Christian virtue—faith. I would not have volunteered for such terrifying exploits had I not been, like many others in my position, keen to get into the Medical Corps at all costs. Despite misgivings at my possible lack of "toughness," I found Jesus' words to St. Paul "My grace is sufficient for thee," equally valid for me, and in Christ I was able to do much that appeared impossible.

My experiences in action in Normandy were completely contrary to what I had expected. War is like that. Our whole 'plane-load was dropped at least eight miles off our objective, and I spent five days, with a few others of my unit, endeavouring to regain the British lines. I was then wounded and taken prisoner. Life just at that moment seemed to be bristling with unpleasant possibilities. My fears, however, were not realised, for during my twelve weeks as a wounded prisoner of war I was never handled roughly or unkindly. The standard of medical treatment did not compare with our own, and there seemed to be a shortage of supplies and hospital staff, but as far as I could see the same conditions prevailed for the German wounded.

I spent most of my time in captivity in a large Paris hospital which was staffed with German sisters and orderlies and French nurses. Here we had no difficulty, by means of signs and 20 or so German words, in being friendly with most of the guards and staff. Many acts of individual kindness were done by our captors outside their normal duties. The German sisters were, practically, without exception, kindness itself—I saw their faces sad when our men suffered, and one sister, who had lost her mother in an air-raid three months before, even cried when one British soldier died.

When the Americans, in their rapid advance, neared Paris, the Germans hurriedly evacuated the hospital, and luckily for me left me behind with about 250 other Allied soldiers. For seven anxious and exciting days the F.F.I. fought the two German divisions still in Paris. Then the Americans entered the City, and soon we were on our way to England.

I shall be eternally grateful for such an experience. It has taught me much, particularly two main lessons. First, that it is nonsense to talk of the German nation's being completely brutalised, as our propaganda would have us believe. I tried while I was a prisoner to study the German men and women I met in the light of all I had read of them in our newspapers, and, try as I could, I saw no justification for thinking that the German, individually, was brutal to any greater degree than our own men. It was fairly clear that the Germans had a strong tendency to regimentation and were docile to an extraordinary degree, lacking also a sense of humour, but they certainly seemed no less or more moral than our chaps. Secondly, if God guides us to a certain course of action we may trust Him completely as to the consequences. I was convinced in 1943 that I should volunteer for parachuting, although I was also certain that God has a vocation for me in the Anglican ministry after the war. On the face of it, the first seemed very likely to make the second impossible! It is evident, however, that I did not trust in vain, and I believe that, although I am not yet fully recovered, I am much more fit for my future work than I should have been without the experience.

Yours very sincerely,

ERNEST H. CHITTY.

WAR COMMENTARY TRIAL

Last month we published the Press Association report of the second Police Court hearing of this case on Friday, March 16. Below we publish the P.A. report of the trial at the Old Bailey. We make a short comment on this case in another column and we propose to deal fully with this disgraceful business next month.

"PRESS ASSOCIATION" REPORT.

Three men and a woman pleaded "Not Guilty" at the Old Bailey on Monday, April 23, to having between November, 1943, and February, 1945, conspired to endeavour to seduce from duty persons in H.M. Forces and to cause disaffection likely to lead to breaches of their duty.

They are: Vernon Richards, 29, Civil Engineer, and Marie Louise Richards, 26, Secretary, both of Eton Place, Hampstead; John Christopher Hewetson, 32, Medical Practititioner, Willow Road, Hampstead, and Philip Richard Sansom, 28, Commercial Artist, Camden Street, N.W.

They also pleaded "Not Guilty" to endeavouring to cause disaffection by disseminating copies of a paper called "War Commentary" and to having in their possession or control a circular letter which was of such a nature that dissemination of it would constitute a contravention of Regulation 39 A.

A further charge against the Richards, to which they pleaded "Not Guilty," was having a leaflet headed "Fight? What For?"

The Attorney-General (Sir Donald Somervell), opening the Crown's case with Mr. Anthony Hawke, said that "War Commentary" was a paper which was headed "For Anarchism."

Among the objects of the Anarchist movement was opposition to "All means of maintaining a class-divided Society-Parliament, the Legal System, the Police Armed Forces, and the Church."

"The principle these people advocated," said Sir Donald, "is an armed Revolution," and passages in issues of "War Commentary" were an exhortation to soldiers to organise themselves into Councils in order to be ready for the armed revolution.

" 'Hold on to your arms'—

"That expression is repeated in two successive numbers of the paper," said Sir Donald.

"You will also find descriptions of mutinies which occurred in the German Army and in the Russian at the close of the last war.

"Writing history is no offence, but I submit the description of these events are not put forward as matters of history, but as examples of what our soldiers should do in this country when the time comes at the end of the war."

Sir Donald said it was not necessary to prove that any member of the Services had been actually seduced from his duty, but he submitted it was plainly part of the scheme to endeavour to get soldiers to spread the propaganda, and copies of the paper had reached soldiers who subscribed to it in Leamington, Lancaster, Derby, and the Orkneys.

Sir Donald then read the Circular Letter, which was headed Freedom Press, 27 Belsize-road, October 25, 1944, and began "Dear Comrades." One extract read, "By the way, don't keep 'War Commentary' in your pocket or under your mattress when you have read it. First let your room-mates see it, and then contrive to lose it in some convenient spot."

Another part read:

"In many cases we find Comrades uniting with I.L.P. and Trotskyists to exchange thoughts and literature . . . . Many other soldiers openly express views which are unconsciously Anarchist. It is the task of our Comrades to help and develop these potential comrades . . . . Experience will have taught Comrades that these discussions bring sympathy and unity of feeling to Barrack-rooms which authority is always try to split . . . . Solidarity frightens authority. You should, therefore, do everything possible to establish closer contacts . . . . Such discussion groups may form the basis for future Soldiers' Councils. One of the most important questions in our opinion is that of the action of Soldiers' Councils in a Revolutionary situation. Whilst many Comrades know the role played by such Councils during and after the last war in Russia and Germany it would seem that only a few know of their vital function and mission"

In another part of the letter it was stated that cartoons in "War Commentary" were being used instead of pin-up girls. . . . "They prove most effective media for a rousing discussion although often provoking interference from ignorant N.C.O.'s and Officers."

When Mr. Justice Birkett asked the meaning of "C.P." in the letter and Sir Donald replied, "Communist Party," there was a burst of laughter from the public benches.

Sir Donald then read extracts from "War Commentary." Copies of the various editions were distributed to the Judge, Jury and Counsel.

The charge against Richards and his wife related to a poem, two verses of which read:

Your country, who says you've a country,
You live in another man's flat.
You haven't even a backyard,
So why should you murder for that.

"You haven't a hut or a building,
No flower, no garden, it's true,
The Landlords have grabbed all the country,
Let them do the fighting—not you."

A number of soldiers in whose possession copies of "War Commentary" or the circular letter had been found gave evidence, and said they had not been disaffected by the documents.

"War Commentary" was published by the Freedom Press, Belsize Road, Hampstead, of which Hewetson was proprietor, and printed by Express Printers, of which Vernon Richards was proprietor. Mrs. Richards was registered as manageress of Express Printers.

Detective-Inspector Hoare said he found a number of envelopes addressed to men in the Forces at Sansom's Studio. One was addressed to an R.A.F. man at Secunderabad and another to a Sergeant in the B.L.A. Others addressed included the Officers' Mess, R.A.F. Bletchley, a ship at sea, and various parts of England.

Replying to Mr. John Maude, K.C. (for Hewetson and Vernon Richards), the Inspector said Hewetson was Casualty Officer at Hammersmith Hospital, under the British Post-Graduate Medical School.

The envelopes were not in Sansom's handwriting, he said, answering Mr. James Burge.

Detective-Inspector W. Whitehead said that at the premises at Belsize Road, where both the Richards were present, he found a document headed, "Subscribers in the Forces," containing 95 names, one of whom was in non-combatant unit.

At the conclusion of the case for the Prosecution Mr. Derek Curtis-Bennett, K.C. for Mrs. Richards, unsuccessfully submitted there was no case to go to the Jury.

Mr. James Burge made a similar application on behalf of Sansom.

The Attorney-General said he would not press against Sansom the charge of endeavouring to cause disaffection by disseminating copies of "War Commentary," and Mr. Justice Birkett said that on the other charges there was a case for the Jury.

Mr. John Maude, K.C., then opened the case for Hewetson and Vernon Richards.

Mr. Maude said that the Jury might remember reading in their youth of Anarchists who were members of cloak and dagger societies and of Anarchists who were executed.

Referring to the Old Bailey dock as "The unhappiest seat in the whole of England," Mr. Maude said that if the Jury had been imagining to themselves specimens of the full-blooded Anarchist he suggested that they had never seen anything less like it than those people in the dock.

Mr. Maude maintained that none of the accused had had the slightest intention of disaffecting any man in the Army.

The hearing was adjourned and accused were released on bail.

The hearing was continued on Tuesday, April 24.

Mr. Maude, continuing his opening address, disclosed that Richards was of Italian origin and changed his name in 1940 His parents came to this country in 1897, before he was born, and after his father had been shut up on the penal islands of Pantelleria and Lampedusa because he has been active against the dictatorship of Crispi.

Counsel read long articles from various copies of "War Commentary" and urged that it did not make sense, to suggest that these articles in which the phrase "hold on to your arms" occurred, referred to British soldiers. They dealt with the situation on the Continent and were addressed to the workers who were holding arms. In Britain the workers did not hold arms.

Observing that none of the Service witnesses called by the Prosecution had admitted being disaffected, Mr. Maude went on,

"Surely it would have been possible to find some stalwart fighting man who would say he had been disaffected."

Mr. Justice Birkett: There is no such duty on the Prosecution. All they have to prove is that there was an endeavour.

Mr. Maude stated that both Hewetson and Vernon Richards had worked in this war, the former as a Casualty Officer in a hospital and Richards as a Civil Engineer on the railways, but they both declared that they were not going to be ordered about by any Government.

Referring to the leaflet headed: "Fight? For What?" Mr. Maude suggested that it was absurd to call it a poem. It happened to be a slightly altered form of some verses written before 1929 by an American woman. It was intended for persons about to enter His Majesty's Forces.

Mr. Maude's opening address had lasted almost three hours.

After the luncheon adjournment Vernon Richards gave evidence. He affirmed, and said that he was of Italian parentage. His father was naturalised in 1931. He himself was born in London and was British. His father was imprisoned by the Italians for five years for political activity. He was a B.Sc. of London University. In 1935 he was deported from Paris by the French Authorities because he was suspected of being associated with Anti-Fascist refugees. In 1936, with another man, he publisehd a paper called "Free Italy," and in the same year he started a fortnightly called "Spain and the World." At the outbreak of war he adopted an anti-war attitude and was registered, under protest, as a political conscientious objector. He began "War Commentary" in 1939 with a few friends. Of the publication of 5,000 about 100 went to people in the Services. It was run at a loss.

He did not know who drafted the Circular Letter. He first saw it on December 12 last.

Richards said that he was in favour of discussion groups forming the basis of future Soldiers' Councils, and of Soldiers' Councils being formed during a Revolutionary situation. He had never agreed with any other person to endeavour to seduce anyone in the Services from his duty, nor had he ever endeavoured to cause disaffection likely to lead to a breach of duty. He had never possessed any documents with the intention of disaffecting anyone. They had acted quite openly in everything they had done.

Replying to Mr. Derek Curtis Bennet, K.C. (for Mrs. Richards), he said that he did not think his wife was aware of the existence of some of the documents in the case.

When Richards suggested that the Attorney-General was "Twisting his words," the Judge remarked "You mean that Attorney-General has not quite grasped your meaning."

Re-examined by Mr. Maude, Richards said that he never desired to form Secret Societies. When organised Government broke down he wanted to see the abolition of authority.

In reply to the Attorney-General (Sir Donald Somervell) Richards said that it did not necessarily follow that he would agree with everything in "War Commentary."

Mr. Justice Birkett: Would you approve of the speech of your learned Counsel to-day?—Yes (laughter).

Richards added that the Circular Letter was intended for members of the Forces who subscribed to "War Commentary."

The Attorney-General quoted from the Circular: "Don't keep 'War Commntary' in your pockt or unaer your mattress . . . . Contrive to lose it in some convenient spot."

Richards said that it was only "a light note expressed in a letter to these fellows."

Private Donald L. Dyer, Non-combatant Corps, said that the articles in "War Commentary" and the Circular Letter had not affected his allegiance to the King or his duty to his officers.

The Attorney-General read a statement to the Police in which Dyer had stated: "I think the whole tenor of the articles aim at incitement to mutiny in as much as they applied to the Army."

Attorney-General: Does that represent the general impression conveyed on your minds?—Yes.

Hewetson, who also affirmed on religious grounds, said he did not believe in political parties. In 1941 he refused a Commission in the R.A.M.C. He ignored his calling-up notice, and went to prison, but was released on Appeal after seven weeks. He did not draft the articles or the letter. He had never desired to subvert any man in the Services.

When the Judge asked what Hewetson meant by "Social Revolution," he replied: "The kind of society we want—wholly free from external authority in which men can act according to their desires and build up a world of freedom by mutual agreement." All existing institutions, such as the Church, the Law, Soldiers and Police, would pass away, he added.

The Judge: What comes in place?—An organisation of society based on mutual agreement rather than on principles of coercion. We don't flatter ourselves we shall bring it about.

The Judge: If to-morrow, quite voluntarily, without any effort on your part, the Army decided to do nothing more in the way of defence or anything else, would you be pleased?—I would be quite indifferent at the present moment. The Army is sometimes used to oppress the people.

Replying to another question, Hewetson said that the Army was not oppressing the people at the moment.

The Judge: The disappearance of the Army now or at any time would be quite in accordance with the philosophy of the Anarchism in which you believe?—In a sense, yes, but in a sense, no. I cannot imagine the Army disappearing without other organs of oppression disappearing at the same time.

Mr. Maude: You are employed by an L.C.C. hospital under authority. Does the establishment of Anarchism involve the dissolution of that hospital?—No. Hospitals are not under authority in the same way as an Army. The L.C.C. does not tell me what to do with my patients. It only tells me to do a certain job. I am responsible for that job.

Mr. Maude: What happens about gardeners in the parks? Who would tell them where to plant flowers? —They would be told by the people who wish plants to be planted in the gardens, rather than by some central centralised authority.

Mr. Maude: I must understand this myself. So far as the Army is concerned I am now thinking of our

WHICH REMINDS US

In the Forward, for March 31 last, Emrys Hughes has treated of the career of Lloyd George with devastating thoroughness. There is no need to add to his indictment. Hughes sums up the matter well in the following passage:

Our age is familiar with the type of Left Wing Socialist who begin as rebels, revolutionary demagogues, and then develop into careerist politicians, and then shamefacedly betray the people who made them.

Every country which has passed through the phase of Parliamentary Democracy knows them. Briand and Laval in France; Mussolini in Italy; Macdonald and Lloyd George in Britain.

It is a great pity, however, that Hughes, notwithstanding his excellent anti-war stand, panders deliberately to the careerist and closes his columns to any appreciation of the work of the genuine revolutionary Socialist. This is done consistently and deliberately and argues that Emrys Hughes himself sympathises with the careerist. Actually, he has never indicted careerists at the moment of their rising careerism. Which is a very bad fault in a propagandist. This censure notwithstanding, Emerys Hughes on Lloyd George is excellent and most useful reading.

Hughes powerful indictment of the career of Lloyd George, and the conventional tribute paid to his memory by Winston Churchill, recalls the meeting organised on Monday, April 24, 1939, by the Communist Party's then Left Book Club in the Empress Hall, Earl's Court, London. The list of speakers included: Richard Acland, M.P.; Sir Norman Angell; Sir Stafford Cripps, K.C., M.P.; the Dean of Canterbury; the Rt. Hon. David Lloyd George, M.P.; Harry Pollitt; Wilfred Roberts, M.P.; and John Strachey. Mr. Pollitt's name was placed directly after that of Lloyd George, whose one aim at the conclusion of the Great War was to crush Bolshevism, and who subsequently fathered the Emergency Powers Act under which about sixty members of the Communist Party were imprisoned within a few months.

This meeting was reported in the Left News for May, 1939, which was edited by Victor Gollancz. The paper boasted that there were ten thousand L.B.C.ers at the meeting.

The report was written by Cedric Belfrage, who was described in an editorial footnote as being

"the author of "PROMISED LAND," one of the most popular Choices that the Club has issued. He has been resident for some time at Hollywood."

It is unfair to say that his report is worthy of Hollywood.

Take for example the following extract:

It was my first Left Book Club rally, and perhaps I estimate it wrongly, but it seemed to me that Monday night was like a graduation day for those ten thousand people in quest of truth. We have been studying for three years, in order to learn how to think, and to learn about that democracy which we had taken for granted because we could not conceive of it being attacked. We are beginning to know how to think, and now we understand how we must act. All of us, from the poorest unemployed worker contributing a penny a month for a group subscription up to Lloyd George and Gollancz himself and the other celebrity members on the platform, have learned a lot. During Lloyd George's speech there was a voice from far back somewhere: "What about India? Remember the Black and Tans!" (L.G. did not hear and asked the Dean what was being said, and the Dean blandly replied: "He said Speak up!")

It would, perhaps, have been strange if from that vast throng had not come one such voice. It came from far back in space and from far back in time. To think of Lloyd George, Winston Churchill and the Duchess of Atholl as our allies is the hardest lesson we ever had to learn. But the mood of the other 9,999 people in the Empress Hall showed how well the lesson of unity against reactionary attack has been digested.

Just imagine! Interruptions about India and the Black and Tans were condemned in this Communist Party-Gollancz report as being reactionary! What a pretty picture of how to act!

The report continues:

The Left Book Club has done a job. We have learned that recriminations about the past are useless and evil, because they divide when unity is the people's only weapon. Yes, Lloyd George learned it and Harry Pollitt has learned it and Cripps has learned it. We were all proud of Lloyd George on Monday night because, having learned it, he was acting upon it; because, having seen the truth, he stood up before that multitude with Pollitt beside him and testified to the truth.

Imagine a Communist Party audience being proud of Lloyd George! Imagine Winston Churchill as the new-found friend of the people! Yet these suggestions were advanced not as mere rhetorical slogans but as realities. These cries for Churchill, Lloyd George, and the Atholls were expressions of the new party line. They inspired the campaign euphemistically termed "Chamberlain Must Go." Note, not that Capitalism must go but only Chamberlain. Leaflets were circulated throughout the country by the Communist Party and its allied organisations. In Glasgow, Willie Gallacher attacked, not conscription, but only "Chamberlain's Conscription," under the auspices of the Glasgow Trades Council. The idea was to remove Chamberlain and to recall Churchill

Let us realise the reaction that this implied. Consider how thoroughly opposed this campaign was to the traditions of the working-class struggle and to all that previous pseudo-revolutionary activity that made the Communist Party possible in this country.

When Chamberlain, changing his Munich policy, went in for war preparation and introduced conscription, Willie Gallacher and other Communist leaders told us that we must not resist conscription but must insist on the pact with Russia. We were informed steadily that, despite the fact that Chamberlain, as British Prime Minister, step by step consented to the Soviet's demands and so committed his government to political policies that were fraught more with war than with peace, Soviet Russia felt a deep distrust of Britain and was full of legitimate misgivings."

The personality of Neville Chamberlain was distasteful to Stalin, not because Chamberlain had been connected with the armament industry, nor because of the anti-Socialist traditions of the Chamberlains. Stalin was distrustful of Chamberlain because he felt that the some-time British Prime Minister preferred Capitalist peace to Capitalist war.

This view of Chamberlain may not have been correct, and there was most decidedly a Socialist case against Chamberlain for introducing conscription without a mandate from the people, and for pursuing a policy of war preparedness. The Communist campaign against Chamberlain's conscription urged that it was not reactionary enough. Because his war preparations were not severe enough "Communists" opposed Chamberlain.

The Communist Party and its Tory diehard supporters aimed to get rid of the umbrella man and to call to office the man with the big cigar. Moscow wanted Churchill to be Prime Minister. Litvinov was replaced by Molotov in order to give expression to this fact.

The New Leader, for Friday, June 30, 1939, described the attitude of the Glasgow Trades Council towards conscription:

"A short time ago an application was submitted from the No-Conscription League requesting that the Trades Council should hear a deputation from that body. . . .

". . . A few weeks previously a deputation on A.R.P. had been received, comprising Lord Provost Dollan, Major Oates (Tory leader) and Chief Constable Sillitoe—but by 58 votes to 63 the Glasgow Trades' Council refused to hear a deputation from the No-Conscription League.

"Chief opponents of the proposition were leading Communist Party 'democrats' George Middleton and Peter Kerrigan. In the discussion one C.P. supporter intimated that 'The no-Conscription League is not a new organisation—it is an organisation formed during the last war by those people who were of military age but were too afraid to fight.'"

The article describes the arrangements for the White City demonstration against conscription, and how "the C.P. controlled Executive Committee" made William Gallacher, M.P., the chief speaker. It concluded:

"The demonstration held in the White City became a protest against 'Chamberlain's Conscription,' with all the usual qualifications about pacts with foreign Governments. The Peace Groups in Glasgow were thereby excluded and what might have been a great expression of opposition to Conscription by Glasgow workers became a miserable fiasco, destroyed by C.P. sectarianism."

Comment is unnecessary on this state of affairs, of which our contemporary gave very full details.

The Daily Worker for Friday, September 25, 1931, contained a report from which the following excerpt is made.

"An open meeting to discuss the organisation of the workers' fight against the 'National Government' was held at the Friends Meeting House in London, on Wednesday evening. The meeting took place under the auspices of the National Unemployed Workers' Movement, and about 30 people were present.

The discussion largely took the form of a controversy between members of the Communist Party and the Independent Labour Party on the question of how to build up the united front of the working class. . . .

WAL HANNINGTON was elected to the chair.

WILLIAM RUST said that in the present situation the question of the united front of the working class was of the utmost importance. The object of the Communist Party was to bring about this united front.

But they must be perfectly clear and definite in the interests of the working class. . . .

There had been speeches by Maxton in which he supported the idea of a third Labour Government, though he must be aware that it was the second Labour Government which had led the workers into the present terrible situation.

Then, again, there had been an article by Brailsford only a couple of weeks ago in the "New Leader," advocating the abolition of the gold standard and promising that everything would be lovely in the garden if this were done—a most stupid article, most misleading for the working class. . . . ...It was impossible for the Communist Party to refrain from pointing out how dangerous to the workers such theories were. Buchanan, too, had signed his name to a manifesto of a Fascist paper in favour of the abolition of the gold standard. . . .

The gulf between the Communist Party and the I.L.P. cannot be bridged.

The I.L.P. shares responsibility for the policy of the Labour Government, and was a partner to all the lies told at the general election of 1929. . . .

CAMPBELL STEPHEN: Rust spoke of the I.L.P. being in favour of going off the gold standard. I take it Rust is against this. In that case I may assume that the Communist Party stands officially for the gold standard.

RUST: The Communist Party is neither for nor against the gold standard, for the whole, either way, is part of the machinery of capitalism, which we are seeking to overthrow.

And now—how are the war reparations imposed by Russia to be paid except in terms of the gold standard?

Persons present at this meeting included James Maxton, M.P., John Beckett, M.P., David Kirkwood, M.P., Campbell Stephen, William Rust, etc.

In A Policy for The Labour Party, published in September, 1920, MacDonald wrote:

The growth of the (Labour) Party and the way in which the idea that it is in some special way a menace to Society, has made large sections of people flutter around that will o' the wisp, a Party which in itself gathers up all the national interests, all the opinions, all the ideals that make for stability and progress. This is an abortion of feeble politics.

A party may be national in its aims, but the idea of a National Party is only our old enemy, "the continuation of foreign policy" in a new garb and on a new stage. It receives hospitable welcome only from stupid people.

Speaking at a Labour Demonstration, in Reading, in December, 1930, Ramsay MacDonald said:

"They heard to-day suggestions about a National Government . . . joining all the wise heads together.

Well, a National Government looks very well on paper and is a magnificent idea for those of you who have never been inside the House of Commons.

Within a year MacDonald had planned a National Government.

Ramsay MacDonald, in his Windsor uniform, was the parliamentary conclusion of Keir Hardie in his miner's cap.

PASTEBOARD INTERNATIONALISM

By EDITH WYNNER

(Co-Editor with Georgia Lloyd, of "Searchlight on Peace Plans: Choose Your Road to World Government": E. P. Dutton, 1944.)

The self-appointed cheer leaders who make the customary noises of polite enthusiasm every time the current crop of Christian Princes get together to jot down their random ideas on scraps of paper are busy again. This time it is the Yalta or Crimea Conference of the "Big Three" (February 3-11, 1945) which evokes their somersault routine. Previously it was the Atlantic Charter August, 1941), then the United Nations Agreement endorsing the Charter (January, 1942), then Casablanca (January, 1943), Quebec (August, 1943), Moscow (October, 1943), Cairo (November, 1943), Teheran (November-December, 1943) and now Yalta.

Superlatives have been heaped on the results of each of these meetings—superlatives that acquire more and more of a hollow ring as actual developments turn these artificially inspired enthusiasms sour. For the less-known about the decisions at these gilded gatherings the greater the omniscient optimism of glib chatterers of voice and pen.

The next joyous demonstration will take place on or about April 25th, when energetic efforts will be made to affix the rubber stamp to the pasteboard internationalism of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. If "Big Three" plans go through, this United Nations meeting will go down in history as the Rubber Stamp Conference. Chaotic dictatorship of the "Big Three," now exercised extra-legally by self-appointment under the stress and emergency of war, would then be legalised and institutionised. The national leaders, whose prime concern is the national interest of their own countries, are to be authorised as a sort of avocation to cast a preoccupied eye on world affairs any time they think things are getting slightly out of hand.

And this fantastic eighteenth century world is about to be imposed on a bloody and battered humanity that is already living in the twenty-third century of rocket bombs, jet-propelled planes, and even now may be on the threshold of the application of atomic energy to destruction. This atrocity is perpetrated in a chamber-music atmosphere of comfortable applause supplied by a remarkable assortment of League of Nations Loyalists, totalitarian liberals, wagon-climbers, American Century planners and the well-meaning rank-and-file which has been attracted by the noise.

The Dumbarton Oaks Proposals provide for an executive of Great Power national governments who are to enforce on all others their notions of peace without international legislative sanction or judicial restraint. Under any objective analysis this spells tyranny. It also spells an indefinite extension of the present chaos, for agreement of four or five Great Powers, suspicious of each other's ultimate purpose, is just as precarious within the Dumbarton Oaks plan as it is now outside it.

Studied by itself, the plan is tragically two hundred years behind the times. Studied against the background of millions killed, wounded, starved and driven from their homes, and of an estimated annual war expenditure by the United States, alone, of ninety billion dollars—when the League of Nations at the pinnacle of its membership never had more than an annual budget of seven million dollars—these Proposals are a crime. Analysed against the background of an Administration-Legion-totalitarian-liberal- backed campaign to impose permanent military conscription on the United States and President Roosevelt's plan to set up a super-duper American spy system to collect "military, economic, political and scientific information reflecting the intentions and capabilities of other nations to make war," Dumbarton Oaks lays an ominous smokescreen behind which preparations for the next war are already fully under way.

It is highly suspicious that most Dumbarton Oaks salesmen are also peddling full-scale preparations for American militarism second to none to be used should the United Nations organisation fail to keep the peace. Instead of encouraging those working for the adoption of federalised structure that could assure its success, there is an elaborate State Department-sponsored campaign to discourage and stifle all remedial criticism of the Dumbarton Ooaks Proposals. This parallel policy of setting up an international organisation gagged, manacled and hobbled while at the same time building a super military machine is the most sinister trickery of bankrupt statesmanship.

Those who, it was feared, might catch on to the deception and call popular attention to the fact that all the eggs being laid for future safety are still put in one basket—the war basket, were quickly subjected to elaborate doses of State Department swing sessions, flattery and subtly-injected intimidation. Those stalwarts who still refuse to get on the State Department bandwagon are to be gagged as far as possible and certainly smeared.

In the thirties the universal swear-word was "communist." This was succeeded by "isolationist." The current labels formulated for less-gifted assistants by Churchill and Roosevelt, are "Trotskyite Communist" and "Perfectionist." A Trotskyite Communist is anyone who encouraged and equipped by the "Big Three" to take pot shots at Nazis who, having acquired the habit of taking pot shots, is now using his own lists despite orders to desist. The "perfectionist," although completely unarmed, is a far more dangerous character. He is one who refuses to believe that as long as Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin are running world affairs in threadbare eighteenth century style all is well with the peace of the world. The "perfectionist" is a pesky individual who, after two World Wars within 25 years insists on the reality of world government and will not be content with an outline draped around a precarious triumvirate of three elderly gentlemen. It is grudgingly conceded that "perfectionists" are "good people"—but dangerous!

However, this definition must be clarified for not all, merely the constructive "perfectionists" are distasteful. The perfectionists of destruction are honoured characters. Anyone who can improve the instruments whereby man destroys his fellow-men, with the invention of better V—1's, —2's, —3's and —4's will find a hearty welcome, unlimited funds and colourful decorations. Similarly favoured are those who seek to perfect the militarization of the nation by destroying all personal freedom through forced labour and total conscription.

It must be extremely confusing to the Germans and Japanese when they hear how they are to be made to drink the water of peace while their would-be teachers are going around intoxicated by the wine of war. Imitation is the highest form of flattery and the Germans and Japanese will be filled with wonder at our version of their wickedness when they will see it permanently land-leased to those intending to reform them.

Those leaders of public opinion who have been corralled into following instead of leading the Administration are helping to pass sentence of death on the current and future crops of war-babies. The function of popular leaders is to lead, not to follow, officials. Our duty is to create popular pressure to push governments further than they intend or think they can go. If we do not demand the maximum we know to be necessary, how can we tell whether it has a chance of acceptance?

The Dumbarton Oaks Proposals represent the thinking of three national governments. The Chinese, whose plan went far toward federalised world government with legislative, administrative and judicial functions were pointedly ignored and just brought in for the signing and pictures. The interest of the great bulk of mankind has been ignored. The so-called middle-sized and smaller nations are to be slugged into signing on the dotted line at the coming San Francisco Conference. The softening-up process has been proceeding for months.

For their own protection against the erratic dictatorship of three Great Powers, the smaller nations would more than likely support a considerable degree of federalization of the proposed United Nations organisation. Federalization would protect their right to sovereignty over national affairs while assuring that sovereignty over international affairs is pooled by all governments and transferred to a new level of world government instead of, as now contemplated, to three national leaders.

The peoples of the United States and of the United Kingdom, composing the population of two of the Great Power authors of this plan, are in a key position to strengthen efforts of the smaller nations to transform the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals into a peace-creating instrument.

To encourage the smaller nations to insist on the reality of government on a world scale, popular pressure should concentrate on obtaining the following basic changes under representation, function and enforcement:

I. REPRESENTATION:

(a) Each nation ought to have several delegates who are to be permitted to vote according to individual judgment in order to allow differences of opinion within nations on world affairs to be joined across national boundaries with the like-minded of other nations.

(b) Delegates ought to be popularly elected by a uniform system drawn up, regulated and supervised by the United Nations.

(c) Membership should be thrown open to all peoples without any confusing qualifying labels such as the current meaningless "peace-loving."

II. FUNCTION:

(a) The Assembly should be empowered to exercise real legislative, not merely talking authority. It should be given specific but limited power to make laws on all world affairs about which, under the Dumbarton Oaks plan, it is allowed to talk.

(b) It should be given authority to raise its own revenues from sources untapped by national governments, such as licensing of international air, sea and rail transport; cable and radio communications.

(c) The Council should be a real executive body of individuals elected by the Assembly and not an executive of national governments trying to straddle the double job of national affairs and world affairs. The Council should carry out the world administrative responsibilities resulting from the legislative activity of the Assembly.

(d) The Permanent Court of International Justice would thus acquire original jurisdiction over all disputes under world law whether between nations or individuals and ought also to have appellate jurisdiction over the highest national courts.

III. ENFORCEMENT:

(a) The Council should have authority to provide enforcement by legal process, operating on individuals, of all laws and regulations passed by the Assembly. Enforcement operating on individuals can be carried out by a small body of trained enforcement and prevention agents. This type of enforcement will enable the United Nations to by-pass national governments and to seek out in every case of infringement of world law the guilty individual, firm or corporation.

(b) Police power must apply equally to all and must function with legislative sanction and under judicial restraint. Without these safeguards it is erratic, arbitrary and tyrannical.

(c) The popular cry for the trial and punishment of war criminals indicates a glimmer of recognition of the fact that individuals do have a part in the world-wide breakdowns that explode into war. The United Nations would be strangled in the same strait-jacket as the League of Nations if deprived of the right to indict, try and restrain individual violators of world law.

This is a life-and-death issue. For the problems of destruction and annihilation the best brains are mobilised by the governments. We, the people, must mobilise our creative forces to meet the problems of international government. The patterns exist as well as the practical experience on the basis of which we can create a solution. All that is needed is the will to do it. The human family may still be saved from future orgies of self-destruction if we will act now to lay sound foundations for a governed world.

COMMUNISTS AND WAR

Dear Comrade Aldred,—The excellent articles published in the Word exposing the duplicity and double-dealing of the Communist Party leaders should be sufficient to convince any reasonable man of the folly of supporting a party which shows no loyalty to the British working-class but acts first and foremost in the interests of the Soviet Union—which means the handful of tyrants who have seized all power in their own hands, deprived the Russian workers of freedom of election and a free press and regimented and disciplined them on a scale unknown even under Tsarism.

But strange as it may seem there is still an inability in the British workmen to understand the real connection of the British Communist Party with the Soviet bureaucracy and the fact that the leaders of British Communism are utterly incapable of bringing liberty to the working class of this country by virtue of their subservience to a tyrant Power. While speaking frequently of the unhappy lot of British "wage-slaves" the Communist leaders reveal themselves as the most miserable wage-slaves in the world to-day, slaves whose very thoughts are dictated by a totalitarian regime that knows not liberty, and who are compelled to change their opinions overnight at the behest of masters many of them have never seen. Witness the amazing volte-face of the Communist Party on the question of the fundamental character of the war—first declared to be just, then declared to be unjust, and later still declared to be just again.

Is the British Communist Party a party of the British workers representing British working-class interests or is it a branch of the Russian Foreign Office carrying out the orders of its masters? Anyone who doubts the inability of the Communist Party to adequately represent the interests of the British working class, anyone who fails to see that it takes its orders from abroad, and will if required to do so absolutely ignore the interests of the British people should make himself acquainted with the first rule of the Communist Party of Great Britain which used to read as follows:

"The C.P.G.B. is a section of the Communist Internationale and is BOUND BY ITS DECISIONS." (Blacks mine).

Moreover, according to the Constitution of the Comintern, "The decisions of the Executive Committee are obligatory for all sections of the Communist International, and must be promptly carried out." (Italics mine).

This rule applied when the Third International decided to announce its formal suicide, from motives of capitalist alliance and military necessity.

And since the Comintern or Third (Communist) International was founded in Moscow, protected and provided with funds by Moscow, it was natural that Moscow should control the show.

It was indeed the testimony of foreign Communists who took part in the Conferences of this Communist International that everything was arranged and all the important resolutions carefully drawn up and prepared in Moscow long before the foreign delegates arrived. It was the duty of the foreign delegates to endorse the demands put forward by the Russian Communists who provided the funds and furnished the prestige without which the International would have dwindled into insignificance.

But other evidence of the subservience of British Communists to Moscow is forthcoming. "The British Labour Party," says Arnold Lunn, "issued a manifesto on Party loyalty in January 1938. In this manifesto the Executive Committee said: "The Communist Party claims to be 'a voluntary organisation based on iron discipline' demanding 'unbounded loyalty to the Party' as the chief characteristic of its membership. It takes not only its money but its orders from Moscow and must obey them slavishly. Harry Pollitt, at the unity campaign meeting in London on April 3, stated: 'It is said I take my orders from Stalin. I plead guilty.'" (Communism and Socialism, p. 23). The same writer quotes the words of the American Communist leader, Earl Browder, from the "International Communist" (French edition), August 5, 1935: "Those who say we do not take orders from Moscow are against the proletarian state. It proves that they are allied to the bourgeoise . . . and are the enemy of the proletarian class . . . To receive orders from Moscow, as Dimitrov said, is to follow the example of Lenin & Stalin." (Communism and Socialism, p. 14).

And in the Labour Monthly (British Communist organ) for October 1935, Harry Pollitt openly declares:

"We of the Communist Party of Great Britain support 100 per cent. and without any reservations, everything that the Soviet Union does in its foreign policy."

That the British workers reflect upon these amazing statements, let them study in the works of Boris Souverine, Victor Serge, Anton Ciliga, and other Communists who have lived in the U.S.S.R., the terrible tyranny to which the Russian workers are subjected, and consider the absurdity of placing their destiny in the hands of men whose first loyalty, as their conduct alone must prove, is to the Moscow Dictators and not to the people who elect them to positions of responsibility in Britain and imagine them to represent the interests of the British working class. The interests of the British working class are not the interests of the Soviet bureaucracy but when Communists have to choose between their loyalty to the British workers and their loyalty to the Communist machine, which functions purely and simply in the service of the Soviet Foreign Office, it is to the latter body that they give support. A British Communist Party, organised by and loyal to the British workers, would at least be understandable. A foreign-controlled body, functioning in the interests of a handful of reactionaries, is a menace to the British or any other people.

U.S. Religious Freedom

The New York Truth Seeker sends us a report on the struggle of Freethinkers in the United States armed Forces.

Shortly after the mailing of the January 1945 issue of our U.S.A. contemporary, the editor was informed that the Secretary of the Navy had issued an official order to each Commandant that compulsory religious attendance of the members of the United States Navy was illegal and must be stopped. The editor wrote immediately to the Secretary of the Navy, asking for a copy of his official order and received the following reply:

"Copies of Navy directives are not available for circulation outside of the service. However, the letter to which you refer stipulated, in substance, that commanding officers may encourage attendance at religious services on a voluntary basis but that wide latitude in religious matters and forms of worship shall be permitted, and that those who do not wish to participate in services shall be excused therefrom."

This communication was signed by R. W. Wood, Commander USNR, Special Assistant and Director of Public Relations.

BOOK REVIEWS

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

In his pamphlet "The International Rights of Conscience," price 4d.. Mr. Douglas J. J. Owen, of 6 Mount Street, Manchester, 2, deals with the problem of securing the recognition of the rights of conscientious objectors in a post-war world from which conscription may only be eliminated slowly and with great difficulty. Mr. Owen is of the opinion that it is very important to secure international recognition of the rights of conscience and that for this purpose there should be pacifist representation at Conferences and on Commissions which deal, from a world standpoint, with the protection of human rights. There is little doubt that if this policy could be put into execution, it would, to some extent, help to secure more uniform and lenient treatment for conscientious objectors whose lot in all countries is hard and in some, intolerable.

At the same time, experience has unfortunately shown that international law is but a poor, weak thing in a world where wars occur. It has also shown that war tends inevitably to become increasingly "total" in character and that Governments waging it become increasingly tyrannical, ruthless and bestial in all their methods and policy.

There is one passage in Mr. Owen's pamphlet which militarists would do well to take to heart. "We in this country ought to treat C.O.s who refuse to fight the enemy with the same humanity we would wish the enemy to treat C.O.s who refuse to fight against us."

"New Leagues for Old;; Blueprints or Foundations?": price 15 cents: published by the Ploughshare Press, 5 Beekham Street, New York 7, New York, is a pamphlet by Dr. Jessie Wallace Hughan, founder and secretary of the War Resisters League and International Council member of the War Resisters International. Starting with a reference to the present gloomy outlook in world affairs produced by the power-lusting ambitions of the visionless statesmen controlling the great Allied nations, the author goes on to refer to the number of plans (most of the more popular ones being pretty futile!) for a better world-order, and comments on similar liberal plans which were put forward after the last war and ignored by the victorious Governments.

The concluding pages of the pamphlet are the best and contain much material which is sound, vigorous and challenging. It is pointed out that though the task grows more difficult and apparently more hopeless each day, agitation for ending this war through a peace by consent must continue, for no other kind of peace can be lasting.

There must be "a frontal attack upon war itself, frankly pacifist in its goal and principles, for there are no safe stopping places on the road to world-peace."

Governments with a new outlook must be appointed, or less idealistic governments properly controlled through the exercise of the franchise. "The task before us is first to change public opinion and second, and concurrently with it, to change the attitude of our public officials or else put others in their place."

Finally, there must be no economic selfishness and a fair sharing of the world's economic resources. In developing this last theme, the author might have handled her subject better if, like so many other reformers, she had not been obviously rather ill-informed with regard to the defects in the monetary system and the important part played by financiers in producing the present state of world chaos. She is a little too inclined to blame Capitalism and Profit for evils really due to Finance, and too apt to exaggerate the degree of "sacrifice" required of a wealthy country like America if she were to be an economic good neighbour to the rest of the world. As in our country, it is not so much sacrifice that is demanded as knowledge and sense, and the only interests which would be adversely affected by reform would be the money-creating money-lenders, the armament makers, and certain big cartels and monopolies which aim at increasing their profits by restricting output.

"Conscience and The Commonwealth," another pamphlet published by the Ploughshare Press, deals with the position of Mr. Milton Mayer, who is, I believe, a Jew of German origin and who, though not a pacifist, is an opponent of the present war, which he believes to be due to economic injustice and to be curable only by a fair sharing of the world's economic resources and by the display of a true brotherly spirit between the men of all nations.

The pamphlet begins with an able preface by Dr. Hughan in which she criticises, albeit in a friendly manner, some of Mr. Mayer's views.

Mr. Mayer's own address starts with a criticism of the true conscientious objector's position which contains a good deal of muddled thinking and some misstatement. It would seem that in America Mr. Mayer has not come across any counterpart of the Fellowship known in this country as the Tramp Preachers who, under no conditions, expected, desired, or required the use of force by the State for their protection, even against burglars, etc. Lacking Christian experience and being, it seems, somewhat unfamiliar with certain striking episodes in Quaker history, he also does not take into consideration the fact that God can, and does, at times of acute crisis and physical danger, give faithful believers an almost miraculous power successfully to overcome evil and violence with good. Mr. Mayer does better when he goes on to deal with the need for economic justice between nations and for a display of a real spirit of human brotherhood and some of the passages where he speaks of the magnitude of the task and the spirit in which it should be undertaken are very fine. Like many Socialists, however, and like Dr. Hughan herself, he appears not to have made a proper study of the monetary system and, in consequence, makes the familiar mistakes about the responsibility of Capitalism for the war and the incompatability of Capitalism with peace. The important and peculiar part played by the financiers thus seems to be a closed book to him. At the end of the pamphlet there is a criticism of Mr. Mayer by the editor of the "Christian Century," who also displays a good deal of muddled thinking, and there are, in addition, a few letters and comments, some of them of considerable ability, explaining the pacifist position. One parody of the Beatitudes, as modified to suit the views of pro-war "Christians," is really very forceful and witty.

Donations received will be acknowledged next month. A bigger response is required immediately to clear our debts and to give us the new machinery we need. Respond now.

The letter from Comrade Burgess, referred to last month, read as follows:—

Dear Guy Aldred,—Hope you will soon have all the money you need so as to be able to carry on your tremendous task.

As a start for the "WORD" FUND, I enclose a cheque for £10, and hope to see many others coming to you in due course for larger or smaller amounts. We cannot afford to lose our paper, or injure your work by leaving you to face all the financial worry.

I wonder who will do your job when mother earth claims you back. With every thanks for your loyalty to our cause.

IS CONSCIENCE A WAR-TIME LUXURY?

The following letter, addressed to the editors, dealing most effectively with this question, was published in our American contemporary, The Progressive, for January 29 of this year:

Dear Sirs,—Mrs. Isabel Bacon La Follette has twice (in her columns for Feb.. 28 and Nov. 20, 1944), expressed her opinion that conscientious objection is a war-time "luxury," and that a conscientious objector is one who thinks "someone else will do the dirty work for him."

Now the fact is, no one is doing the CO's for him, least of all the soldier. The essence of pacifism is that killing is no man's work. The "dirty work" the soldier is doing need not, and should not, be done. That is why the CO is not doing it. The CO asks for no special privileges nor luxury accommodations in which to enjoy the so-called "pleasanter" aspects" in this "best of all possible wars."

He simply announces his decision to serve society in the way he believes most effective, regardless of the treatment accorded him by state. (The position of COs was legalized only after their integrity had been tested by every conceivable form of social and physical abuse during World War I).

It may be difficult for Mrs. La Follette to see the logic of conscientious objection, but the logic of her position is even more obscure. All the arguments adduced from any source will fail to explain satisfactorily why those who are obviously friends of man and his progress can "hate" war and engage in it.

We do not question either their sincerity or their idealism, or their right to their conviction. Nor are we here concerned with how they "got that way." What the student of pacifism would very much like to know is how, after the lessons of World War I, to say nothing of older history and experience, anyone can stay that way!!

The U.S. has between 30,000 and 50,000 COs, of whom 15,000 are non-combatants in medical service with the armed forces. Some 4,000 COs are in prison, and these, according to Roger Baldwin, director of the American Civil Liberties Union, have taken many steps—at the risk of solitary confinement—to eliminate race discrimination and extra-legal punitive practices on the part of prison authorities.

The majority of the COs who are not in prison—the 4Es—are doing "work of national importance" for the duration, without pay, injury compensation, or dependency allotments. Most of these men have already served two or three years under these conditions, and many volunteer for dangerous "guinea-pig" experiments in medical research, or for parachute squads fighting forest fires—likewise without pay. Can this be "luxury"?

On the basis of such information, conscientious objection is to be judged. The pertinent historical facts gradually emerging from the war-torn "White Books" also need careful scrutiny by those who feel compelled to defend the necessity of war.

In conclusion, it should be said that vastly more important than the non-existent "luxury" of the CO's status, is the dangerous precedent for forced or "slave" labour which has been established in his case—a precedent which is the proper concern of all those who cherish the 13th amendment to the Constitution, and American civil liberty in general.

In our next issue we shall publish the full story of our S.L.P. C.O. comrade, Henry Weber, who was sentenced to death in the United States for his resistance to conscription. The sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life, and, later, reduced to five years' penal servitude. The full illustrated story will appear next month, with a tribute to comrade Weber from the pen of our New York comrade, David Berkingoff.

"WAR COMMENTARY" TRIAL.

British Army in Germany. Is it your desire that that one alone—never mind what the Germans might do—should lay down their arms?—No.

Asked why, Hewetson replied, "Obviously it would expose the armies on its flanks to risk.

Evidence for the defence was continued on Tuesday, April 25.

Hewetson, cross-examined by the Attorney-General (Sir Donald Somervell) agreed that their were many workers in the British Forces, and they had arms.

The Attorney-General: If they could hold on to their arms when demobilised they would then be armed workers?—Yes.

The Attorney-General quoted from an article in "War Commentary" on November 11 last: "It is the duty of Anarchy everywhere to urge workers to hold on to their arms," and Hewetson replied that this was plainly directed to the workers in France and Belgium. There was no reference to the workers in this country and it was nonsense to refer it to this country.

The Attorney-General: This paper is published in English and circulated in England.

He read another extract: "While the people have arms in their hands governments are weak," and Hewetson replied: "The people in this country have not got arms."

Mr. Justice Birkett asked why they should welcome the development in France of a revolutionary situation but not here.

Hewetson replied that what they welcomed would be the opportunity "Whereby people can achieve that society of freedom we desire. We do not welcome the bloodshed which sometimes precedes it."

Attorney-General: Why was that Circular Letter sent exhorting people in the Army to form discussion groups which would later be the basis of Soldiers' Councils?—It is the aim of myself and my Comrades that people should discuss the principles that make for a different world.

Herbert Reid, D.S.O., M.C., author and publisher, stated he had known Richards for about eight years, and had always found him an upright, disinterested idealist.

Mr. Derek Curtis Bennett, K.C. (for Mrs. Richards), and Mr. James Burge (for Sansom) urged that they would call no evidence.

Mr. John Maude, K.C., addressing the Jury for Hewetson and Vernon Richards, denied that they had consciously tried to produce a state of affairs in which serving men were seduced from their allegiance to the King.

In a reference to the Article in "War Commentary" dealing with the situation in France and Greece, Mr. Maude contended that it was no good putting on mental blinkers and insisting that in fact the article referred to British soldiers. "To say so is the purest utterest nonsense," he added.

Mr. Maude thought it manifestly wrong to suggest that they wanted to organise secret Soldiers' Councils or anything else secret. There was no attempt to keep the Circular Letter secret. "These people," he urged, "were honestly putting forward something that was not to end in murder or bloodshed, but something they thought was going to lead to some sort of paradise."

Mr Curtis Bennett, K.C. (for Mrs. Richards) submitted that the documents in the case did not mean what the Attorney-General said they meant. It was like taking a newspaper, extracting a few lines here and there and putting them out of their context, which no Serviceman would ever dream of doing, and asking the Jury to draw the worst view.

If the Jury were considering whether Mr. and Mrs. Richards conspired together in the terms of the first count they were doing something the law did not recognise, because a husband and wife could not be conspirators by themselves together. They were considered in law as one person. The Attorney-General would have to prove agreement with one or two of the other defendants, and Counsel urged that there was no such evidence.

Mrs. Richards did not wish to slide out of the case over the backs of other people. She was happily married to a man who was an Anarchist, and she was an Anarchist herself.

Mr. Curtis Bennett asked the Jury not to string all these things together and impugn Mrs. Richards because, as a press reader, she had read the words before they were published. There was no evidence that the Circular Letter or the poem had ever been in her possession or under her control. "They are miles off proving she is even liable for it," Counsel added.

Submitting that there was no evidence against Sansom, Mr. James Burge urged that to a certain extent it was a political trial. The Jury were asked to say that these people were deliberately sabotaging the war effort. But before they could accuse them of being traitors there must be abundant evidence.

Mr. Burge went on to urge that Sansom was charged with having a copy of the Circular Letter in his possession at his studio on December 30. Although it was admitted that he had not been there between November 6 and January. Other people were using the studio when he was away. The highest case the Prosecution could put against him was that he had been assisting in Anarchist work.

The Attorney-General submitted that the sole question was whether there had been an endeavour to seduce soldiers from their duty. He repudiated that it was a political prosecution. It was the Defence who introduced politics—not the Prosecution.

The Attorney-General submitted there was a direct incitement to the forces to hold on to their rifles so that they might play their part in revolt as armed workers.

Mr. Justice Birkett, opening his summing-up, referred to Mr. Burge's statement that it was a political prosecution, the Judge observed: "This Court, if justice is to be done, knows nothing of politics of any kind. It knows nothing of race or religion or creed."

Mrs. Richards could not conspire with her husband, so if the Jury found her guilty of that charge they would have to find that she agreed with Hewetson or Sansom, or some person unknown.

It was not necessary for the Prosecution to satisfy the Jury that anyone had been seduced from his duty. The charge was agreeing to try.

With regard to the charge of endeavouring to cause disaffection by disseminating copies of "War Commentary," the Judge said that the Jury under his direction would return a verdict of not guilty against Sansom.

The Judge described the poem mentioned in the last charge as "the purest doggerel," adding, "but they are not charged with lack of literary form, nor with having doggerels in their possession."

The hearing was adjourned.

Hewetson, Richards and Sansom were each sentenced to nine months' imprisonment. Mrs. Richards was acquitted.

CORBETT BISHOP'S STAND

A New York Letter by JULIUS EICHEL.

Corbett Bishop re-arrested Tuesday, February 20, 1945. Continues Fight for "Liberty or Death." Will not voluntarily drink, eat, or move from prison cot until free.

WHO IS CORBETT BISHOP?

Bishop is a conscientious objector to conscription, regimentation, and war. He fasted for 88 days and was force-fed to keep him alive before he was released at Grand Rapids on December 6, 1944. He had fasted to prove his determined opposition to Civilian Public Service (C.P.S.) and prison as an alternative to war and freedom of conscience.

OTHERS SEE THE SIGNIFICANCE OF CORBETT BISHOP'S OPPOSITION.

I have two items I wish to present to "Word" readers to show the significance of his opposition to government tyranny. The first of these is the following letter from a minister, Rev. Henry H. Crane:

Central Methodist Church,
Detroit, Michigan,
February 7, 1945.

Dear Corbett:

Both Dr. Johnson and I were delighted to hear from you, for every word from your lips or your pen thrills us with a high joy and makes us want to stand at attention and salute you—not as the military marionettes must do, but as the lovers of the good, the beautiful, and the true must do whenever they see legitimate incarnations of this holy triumverate.

To me you are one of God's great thoroughbreds, and I cannot tell you how ardently I admire you for your magnificent demonstration of the power of a dedicated spirit over all things mundane and material. As you have doubtless heard, I preached about you the Sunday after we had our happy conference together, and then, again, later on, when you had carried through your hunger fast to its successful culmination.

I kept asking the question in my sermon, "Why don't they let him die?" for I wanted to haunt my people with that titanic thought. The major answer that I gave to the query, of course, was simply this: that all mankind, when he sees such a demonstration as this, recognizes the infinite potentialities of his own spirit; he realises that he is, after all, made in the image of God: that he is not a mere robot, an animal, a beast, but he has a life that is distinctly of the spirit, that it can ignore all the stupid attempts of weak mortals to restrict and confine the body and can rise triumphantly above every attempt at spiritual seduction. When we see you do what you have done, our whole being cries out that the principle you propound must be true and we can't bear to see such an incarnation pass from this earth.

...So a billion blessings on you as you continue in your matchless modesty, your gracious humility, and your valiant and courageous way. I do hope the government authorities will not be stupid enough to try to follow this up to fulfil some idiotic technical demand. They ought to know when they are licked, defeated, confounded and made ridiculous. But like as not their presumption will lead them on to fantastic efforts to fit you into a conventional mould. But they'll never succeed in their purpose, but rather will they serve to dramatise the wonder and beauty of your life. May the Good God sustain you more radiantly than ever.

Thine most fraternally,
HENRY H. CRANE.

The second item is an editorial, "A War Mother's Apathy Gave us a Shock," in the December 21, 1944, issue of the "Boise Valley Herald," Middleton, Idaho. We only have room to quote excerpts from it as follows:

"CORBETT BISHOP AND IN VARYING DEGREES thousands of other young men to-day are taking the punishment and black-out they are taking because they, like Patrick Henry, will not bemean themselves by taking orders to have any part in going half-way or more round round the world, and killing others and being killed to convince themselves of the pious fraud being mouthed, that we are a peace-loving people. Corbett Bishop and his kind, although lacking the dramatic setting of the Colonial Revolutionists, are demanding "Liberty even more effectively than the famous Revolutionary orator."

While still free on February 8th, Corbett Bishop wrote me the following letter to illustrate his own attitude towards government tyranny:

In the December, 1944, "Reader's Digest," I came across an article by Donald Culross Peattie, on "William Penn, Pioneer of Democracy." I quote from the article:

". . . 'Penn arrested and hailed into Old Bailey Court, charged with unlawful, seditious, and riotous assembly.'

"'Are you guilty of the indictment,' demanded the bewigged and frowning magistrate, Sir Samuel Starling, Lord Major of London.

"'The question,' flung back young Penn, 'is not whether I am guilty but whether the indictment is legal.'

"Above the hubbub that followed he proclaimed that a law denying the inalienable right of a man to obey his conscience is not valid.

"'Stay his mouth! Clap him in the bail-dock!' thundered the Lord Mayor. And, while the jury was instructed in so many words to bring in a verdict of guilty, Penn was forced into a cage as if he had been a wild beast.

"'You, as Englishmen," he called to the jurors, 'Mind your privilege. Don't give away your right!'

"'Nor will we ever,' cried the foreman.

"Quaking but resolved, 12 good men and true returned to pronounce Penn guilty of no crime. The angry Judge threatened to have their noses cut off, and sent them back, without food or fire, till they should change their minds. But nothing broke their will. After five days the Judge, beaten, clapped jurors and accused into Newgate Prison for contempt of court. Penn's dying father paid the fine. The jurors sued the Judge for illegal arrest and won. To-day a monument, on the site of Old Bailey, commemorates 'the great trial for liberty of conscience.'

". . . 'By his influence Penn saved scores of people from arbitrary imprisonment and unjust confiscation of property. Indirectly he saved thousands more by the principles he championed.'"

"THE SEVENTH CROSS."

Those who have seen the movie this title refers to will need no explanation of the text.

By February 19, 1945, most of Bishop's friends knew that the Department of Justice and its agents were looking to arrest him. On December 6, 1944, Corbett had walked out of the Judge's chambers a free man, to the surprise of everyone involved, without any strings other than what was in the back of the minds of United States District Judge Fred M. Raymond and U.S. District Attorney Joseph F. Deeb. Four other C.O.'s were released with him pending the courts determination of the issued involved as presented in the Grand Rapids, Michigan, Court, by Lawyers Francis Heisler and U.S.A. Heggblom, for the defence. On January 15th, the men had been found guilty and were expected to appear in court for sentence on January 24. January 25th Bishop received the following letter from Heggblom:

Yesterday all the boys showed up (Ernest H. Banaszak, Donald Pross Burton, Calvin C. Pope and Bjorn Eikrem) and each was sentenced to a term of three years. I had explained to the court that I had sent a wire to you and that I did not have any way of verifying that you received my telegram, and that I felt the case should be continued for an additional week so that I may have the opportunity of sending you a registered letter. My wish was granted and placed in the form of an order, a copy of which I am enclosing.

Bishop could not conscientiously honour the court's decision or summons, and from that moment he was a hunted man. Monday night, February 19th, he called us from Philadelphia, that he expected the F.B.I. to catch up with him the following morning. On Wednesday, February 21, the papers carried the item that he was arrested and was not co-operative to the extent that he had to be carried to prison. Bishop is a symbol of our struggle for freedom. To-day he may be in Milan (Mich.) Federal Penitentiary, but wherever he may be at this time he needs our help. Let us give it unstintingly. Write to our President and our representatives and insist that freedom of conscience become a reality again in the United States.

ANARCHIST ACTIVITY

Dear Comrade,—I should like to endorse all Tom Brown's remarks in the April "Word." I was also a former member of the Editorial Board of the Freedom Press, and, like Comrade Brown, was "given my cards" by Richards and Hewetson.

We shall be very grateful for any notice you can give to our News Letter and other activities. I am enclosing copies of our statement of principles and organisational basis. We should be very pleased if you could find space to reprint or mention these.

Also enclosed is a copy of the letter we sent to the London Freedom Press Defence Committee together with their reply. Comment is surely unnecessary.

We feel that there is a great need—and a great opportunity to build an active Anarchist movement in this country. This, however, will never be done by those who in one breath speak of "workers' control" and in the next of "legal" control of the movement's press. Honesty is a better weapon than hypocrisy in the workers' struggle.

Yours fraternally, KEN HAWKES.

ANARCHIST FEDERATION OF BRITAIN

15 Parliament Hill, N.W.3,
March 7, 1945.

The Secretary,
F.P. Defence Committee.

Dear Comrade,—We understand that you are the Secretary of a Committee which is being set up in defence of the four members of the Freedom Press Group whose trial is pending. Since we have not been approached on this matter we have hitherto been unable to express our solidarity by collaborating with all comrades rallied in their defence.

It is the wish of our group that we should be represented on the Committee and that our delegates should attend its meetings, so that our assistance may be effective.

Please let us know when the next meeting is held and our delegate will be there.

With fraternal greetings, KEN HAWKES,,
Secretary, A.F. (London Group).

FREEDOM PRESS DEFENCE COMMITTEE,
117 ST. GEORGE STREET
(Second Floor),
HANOVER SQUARE, LONDON, W.1.

Chairman: Herbert Read.
Secretary: Ethel Mannin.
Treasurer: S. Watson Taylor. 19th March, 1945.

Dear Friend,—Your letter concerning representation on the Defence Committee was placed before the last meeting of the Working Committee on the 17th. This matter was discussed fully by the members, the unanimous feeling was that inclusion of a representative from your "group" would not aid the Committee in its effective working. But it was suggested that should you feel that the issues in question seem sufficiently wide to justify your support, you can aid the Committee considerably in publicising the facts of the present case, in mentioning the existence of the Defence Committee and in supporting the Committee financially. A Defence Fund has been set up for the purposes of covering the legal expenses of the accused (which will inevitably be high) and the Committee's own expenses. Cheques and postal orders should be crossed, made payable to the Freedom Press Defence Committee and sent to the Treasurer at the above address.

Yours sincerely, SIMON WATSON TAYLOR,
For Freedom Press Defence Committee

ANARCHIST FEDERATION OF BRITAIN.
ORGANISATION BASIS.

1. The membership of the Anarchist Federation of Britain is open to those prepared to fight actively and on an organised basis to free mankind from all domination and exploitation.

2. The Anarchist Federation is a national organisation, part of the International Anarchist Movement, and is divided into smaller geographical units solely for organisational convenience, the division being laid down from time to time to suit organisational necessity.

3. The actions and propaganda of the Anarchist Federation are decided by all members. The method of reaching decisions is fundamentally that of common agreement reconciling divers points of view. Only where this is not obtainable, majority opinion becomes the decision of the organisation.

4. All members have equal rights and duties. The most important duty is to carry out the decisions of the organisation irrespective of personal convenience or feeling. The basic right is to partake in all decisions and freely to express their point of view or raise qquestions before the organisation. Any office inside the Federation is purely an organisational convenience and gives no superior right to a member designated to fill it. Any member designated for a task or office may be recalled at any time.

5. All means of the organisation are controlled by and form part of the Anarchist Federation of Britain as such. If persons administer any such means on behalf of the organisation they must give an account of their administration when required to do so and surrender their trust at any time to whoever is elected by the organisation to take charge of it.

PRINCIPLES.

THE NEW SOCIETY: The A.F.B. seeks the abolition of capitalist society and the establishment of a new society built upon the common ownership of the means of production and distribution by workers' control of industry.

In such a society there shall be no monarchy or state church, landlord or capitalist, military class or caste of judges. There shall be no House of Lords or Commons, title or privilege. Nor shall there be a standing army or police force, gaoler or hangman, or any special force of public coercion.

Instead, all men shall be social equals and free. Each shall have the opportunity to share in the direction of economic and social affairs, co-operating freely in work or social undertakings, but free to live is private life as he will so long as he respects the same right of others.

In such a society the wages system, finance and money shall be abolished and goods shall be produced and distributed, not for profit, but according to human needs.

CLASS STRUGGLE: "The working class and the employing class have nothing in common." The A.F.B. is based upon the inevitable struggle of the workers against the owners of the means of production and will continue that struggle until the workers gain possession of the means of production.

REFORM OR REVOLUTION: While taking part in the day-to-day struggle of the workers to increase or defend their wages, the A.F.B. rejects the advocacy of parliamentary reforms. Reforms are initiated by members of the employing class as insurance against revolution.

WAR: The A.F.B. is opposed to all wars among capitalist states. It stands firm for the international solidarity of the world's workers. Nevertheless, while we oppose war, we do not urge non-resistance or non-violent submission to ruling class aggression. We believe that it is necessary for the workers to be willing to use violence in their own defence.

THE STATE: "The State is the executive committee of the ruling class." Anarchists do not, therefore, hope to use the capitalist state to achieve the emancipation of the working class; they do not seek to attain seats in the Cabinet or Parliament. Nor do they desire to build a new State upon the ruins of the old. Any attempt by an allegedly working-class party to create a new state could only result in a new ruling class.

Instead, the revolutionary working class must abolish the state and administer economy and all social affairs by workers' committees, without a standing army, gaolers, police force or any special body of public coercion.

ORGANISATION: To achieve these aims the workers must organise. They must replace the hundreds of craft and general trade unions, which divide the workers, by revolutionary industrial unions—Syndicates. To that end the A.F.B. aids the formation of workers' committees in all factories, mines, offices, shipyards, railsheds, mills and other places of work, and carries out propaganda for their development into Syndicates federated to an all-national Federation of Labour.

To popularise this aim it is necessary to build the A.F.B. Recognising the need of organisation for propaganda we, therefore, accept the responsibility which organisation places upon its members. We reject self-seeking, irresponsibility and egoism which are the signs of middle-class frustration, as we also reject the dictatorial form of organisation of certain parties and associations. Without the loss of freedom or personality, by voluntary co-operation, we can avoid both dictatorship and LEADERSHIP: The A.F.B. is opposed to the principle of personal leadership—to the trade-union and Labour leaders, to the adulation of Communist leaders and to the myth of great capitalist political leaders, spread by Communist and Labour propagandists.

It is necessary to have persons who are entrusted with administrative tasks, but such tasks can be carried out by delegates. Such delegates must be instructed by the organisation, unlike leaders who tell the members what they must do. The delegates of the working-class must not be paid salaries and expenses which place them in a social category above the workers, and they should be elected by the members, who should have power to recall them at 24 hours' notice.

Leadership we reject wherever it appears, and under whatever name, even the name of Anarchism. "The emancipation of the working-class must be the task of the working-class."

(LONDON GROUP) NEWS-LETTER.

The London Group News-Letter was issued on March 15. Other numbers will be issued from time to time. It is felt that there is a need for interchange of views and information among workers about the social struggle at home and abroad. While almost all publications issued in this country have their own axe to grind and use the workers' case for their respective political ends, this News-letter sets out to be a forum of free expression for workers in all industries, written by the workers themselves. No charge is made for the News-letter, but readers will realise that in order to produce it a number of overhead expenses must be met, and the A.F. invite all who consider this publication a useful contribution to the independent struggle of the workers, to give whatever financial assistance they can.

News, views and help should be sent to Ken Hughes, Secretary, A.F. (London), 15 Parliament Hill, London, N.W.3.

THE CASE OF FREEDOM PRESS.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—Libertarian Socialists defend, in principle, any individual menaced by the "law" because of his writings, speech, publications or creed.

What concerns us at the moment, is the Freedom Press Publishing Group, who have been prosecuted because of their alleged anti-militarist activity. As soon as I heard of their arrest I expressed my sympathy for these comrades in a letter published in the "Tribune," of March 16, under the title of "Solidarity." This letter closed with the words:

"I firmly believe that capitalist or socialist democracy is a dreadful masquerade, and that to resist oppression is one of the sacred rights of man. And I would maintain this belief even if I were in prison."

This premise, it seems to me, is necessary in order to stress that the following severe criticism is not prompted by any personal feeling or interest in the personalities of the four accused, but the great moral importance of the point arising in the course of the proceedings at Marylebone Police Court.

Three of the comrades, Berneri, her husband Richards, and Hewetson, appear to be the editors of "War Commentary," and, at the same time, appear to be the proprietors of "Express Printers." Nothing is wrong with this. The wrong, it seems to me, begins when the three comrades, whom we will henceforth refer to as Richards and Co., for the sake of convenience, refuse to take an anarchist position when confronted with the "law," when they refuse to take responsibility for their actions, but prefer to shelter behind the "law-makers" by urging their irresponsibility and absolute ineffectiveness.

The question arising from this attitude is clear to all. Can we consider Richards and Co. to be anarchists after their attitude when faced with the law? And if we no longer consider them to be anarchists (which is my view) what are they?

We should keep in mind that, for many years, with one hand they have collected large sums of money in the name of "War Commentary," while with the other hand, they have put this money in their own pockets on behalf of "Express Printers."

For years, they have posed as the high priests of anarchism, but when the test of their anarchism came they failed miserably, and said: "We are sorry, but we were just playing a game."

We can argue, but it seems to me that Richards and Co. cannot be considered anarchists. Furthermore, by their conduct, they have done great harm to the cause of anarchism.

London, March 27, 1945. A. CALTABIANO.

The defence is disgraceful. It is in exactly the same category as that advanced on behalf of Albert Inkpin in 1921, when this contemptible contortionist of the class struggle was sentenced to six months' imprisonment. At that time, Sylvia Pankhurst rightly ridiculed the defence of irresponsibility and Anarchists jeered at the cowardice that inspired it. The same jeers are in order to-day.

In the stern days before us we have no time for pseudo intellectual irresponsibles. The business of Anarchists is to be Socialists aglow with integrity. An Anarchist who lacks integrity is like unto the salt which has lost its savour.

We are opposed to this prosecution which can serve no useful purpose It is a banal conflict. The defenders have not the spirit to be martyrs and the prosecution lacks the judicial sense that belongs to jurisprudence. Neither side witnesses for truth.—Ed.]

BOISE VALLEY NOTES

The Boise Valley Herald, in its issue for February 15, reproduces the striking letter from an airman prisoner of war, published with some effectively sane comment, by the editor of the Bellshill Speaker, in his issue for November 12 last. It is a long way from Bellshill to Boise Valley, but the truth can cover vast territory as well as falsehood. And in the end, the truth emancipates and reconciles until the world is filled with harmony.

In the same issue, the B.V. Herald publishes the following comment :—

BRITISH MEMBERS SPEAK PLAINLY

In publishing Member of Parliament Rhys Davies' Glasgow speech, we are offering our readers a chance to get a little information that is conditioned for them by the Office of War Information. Mr. Davies functions in the House of Commons like the Duke of Bedford does in the House of Lords, in defiance of the smears and calumnies of the "unconditional surrender" supporters. We ought to have their kind of fearless truth-tellers in our own Congress. But we haven't.

The speech referred to was that made by Rhys Davies to the Glasgow Study Circle on Sunday, October 8, 1944.

It is said that one should never publish tribute to one's self on the ground that to do so is to be guilty of bad taste. We do not see why one should pose as a super-man, having no human frailty, not so much as the famous Achilles heel. We rejoice in censure, if the censure is a measurement of our loyalty to truth and the power of our resistance to that which we feel to be entrenched wrong. We rejoice in silence and neglect if that is the price we must pay in order to be at peace with our own conscience. We rejoice in abuse if such is the scorn that those in authority or whose interests we attack feel they must serve out to us. But we like praise if we do not covet it by falsehood. So, even though it exhibit a want of good taste, we make no apology for reproducing the following undeserved lines from the columns of the B.V. Herald for the same date as the issue that paid tribute to Rhys Davies, M.P., and the Duke of Bedford for their pacifist and anti-militarist courage and integrity :—

THOUGHTS TO AN ATOM.

Lines to Guy A. Aldred, one of Nature's noblemen.

By Mrs. Jessie Meglasson.

From out of the bourne of Time I come
I stand apace—an atom in infinitude of space.
Now, I turn my eyes about me and I wonder
Why—why in this brief moment that we linger
Why will man turn beast and sinner?
Thou Great Eternal One, I pray—
Lest these things melt my heart away—
Help me see the Perfect Day.

We reproduce these lines not because we think that they are merited but because we consider them to be good. It is an aim to be "one of Nature's noblemen" and worthy of much striving, even if the success is not marked. The picture, given in these lines, of a propagandist and an agitator, one who seeks to stir the soul of mankind into life, to produce a glorious harmony, is magnificent. The smallness of the prophet—an atom! The magnitude of the vision requested, the greatness of the prayer—to see, to realise, to live into—the Perfect Day! What a beautiful concept of inspiration! For this beauty we publish it. These lines should be addressed to every propagandist, to every vision-maker, to every enemy of war and wrong.

The editor of the B.V. Herald publishes the following addendum to this poem which, if it is not all true, we would like to be true; and we will endeavour, before we die, to struggle to make true—if, for no other reason than that it ought to be true.

Guy A. Aldred is one of Britain's most courageous, clearest-thinking, most forceful-speaking editors and speakers. He has had several jail sentences for his opposition to the government's Imperial and war policies. He is the author of a number of books and pamphlets, and the editor and publisher of "The Word," a magazine dedicated to "Combat Fascism and speed Commonweal."

Still in the same issue, Luther Cowan challenges Editor Cornell on his minority stand for conscience against war, and urges that this idea of minority right leads away from democracy to philosophical anarchy. Cornell replies in part in these clear terms :—

I don't wish to be a martyr or go to jail although I may go to jail before this war is over. I don't believe in wars anyway. I consider war to be the negation of morality, besides the height of nonsense. It appears to me, in my benighted condition of mind, that war is a plaything of rulers to take the minds of the peoples off domestic troubles. 50 years ago, there was a sentence in the grammar for us kids to analyze. "War is a game, which were their subjects wise, kings would not play at." That sentence was written over 50 years ago and said nothing about distators or presidents and it may be outmoded now, But I just can't see any sense in nations and races destroying each other.

All the races I have seen look alike to me. The men have two hands, two feet, one head, and the desire for something to eat and wear. I don't see why they can't all get together and gang up and make war on disease, germs and poverty.

"Then let us pray that come it may,
As come it will for a' that,
That man to man the world o'er,
"Shall brithers be for a' that."

In its issue for February 22, our contemporary reproduced an account of the meeting addressed by the Duke of Bedford at Oxford under the auspices of Group 26. It also published the following strong anti-war resolution adopted unanimously by the Women's League of the United States at Chicago, on December 19, 1944 :—

WHEREAS, This Republic has now been at war three years as an ally of England and Russia, pouring out the riches of the country in men and materials at a rate known only to those intimately connected with the governments of these countries, and

WHEREAS, The so-called "Atlantic Charter" enunciating high principles of self-determination and freedom for all peoples has been abandoned and in its place we now see our allies engaged in a struggle for supremacy in Europe, regardless of the welfare of little nations, and

WHEREAS, this country, while supplying men and resources to carry on this war, has made no apparent effort to look after its own interests in this conflict but is engaged in building the fortunes of our allies exclusively, and

WHEREAS, it is due our men now undergoing the hardships of war and to those endeavouring to perpetuate the life of this Republic that specific information be given to the people of this country as to what victory will mean to us:—

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED, That we, members of the WOMEN'S EMERGENCY CONFERENCE ON OUR NATIONAL CRISIS, in meeting assembled, call upon the Administration for a definite outline of our war aims so that we may know when we have achieved our objectives and when our men may come home.

It was held by this representative gathering, which included members of church and many far from revolutionary organisations, that, unless such aims could be stated, United States sailors, airmen, and soldiers ought to be recalled.

Louis Fischer was one of America's best known newspaper correspondents. He lived in the Soviet Union for fourteen years and was, until 1941, a die-hard defender of the Soviet Union. In Men and Politics, 1942, he wrote :

The Bill of Rights in the (Stalin) Constitution grants and guarantees by law freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and meetings, and freedom of street marches and demonstrations. In life these liberties are non-existent. If a Soviet citizen were to try to publish an article or letter or make a speech attacking the Soviet Government . . . he would soon find himself in jail. . . . In the Soviet Union there is no protection for a political minority. . . . Political opponents and political minorities are purged by shooting, exile, or imprisonment.

ANGLICAN PACIFIST CHAPLAIN'S WAR EXPERIENCES

The following is an extract from a letter written by an A.P.F. member, recently returned to England, giving some account of his experiences as a temporary Chaplain to the Forces in Burma :

My year with the Fourteenth Army was a useful experience. I disliked the idea of an Army chaplaincy, even though mine was only a temporary arrangement, because I supposed that my work would be governed to some extent by Army regulations and I myself be regarded as part of the military machine: but I realised that men in the Forces needed spiritual ministrations just as much as men in factories or coal mines or offices at home. I refused to be regarded as a "morale booster," and said so. In my teaching I gave only what I believed to be such Christian doctrine and exhortation as I would give in civilian life. Sometimes I thought that, perhaps, such addresses as "Peace" and "Christian Freedom" and "Christian Victory" might meet with disapproval from the Colonel: but in actual fact I found not only that he approved, but that the men also responded to them. . . .

Men openly declared to me that they were opposed to the idea of war as a means of settling disputes, and officers had told me that they could regard the Japanese as their brothers in this misfortune and that the sufferings of the enemy were as painful to the heart of God as the sufferings of any Christians. I spoke to them of Japanese Christians, especially of Kagawa who declared that he belonged to God first, in Christ, and after that he belonged to Japan. One sergeant, in charge of a howitzer, told me how his heart sank whenever he pressed the lever of his gun, knowing the hate he was perpetrating through the act.

I found many men eager for a better new world, though for the most part they were vague as to what should constitute reconstruction. They frequently flew to Communism as a remedy. There was much criticism of the organised Church and disappointment with its witness. On the other hand, I met chaplains who were more belligerent than the men. One whom I knew declared it our duty as chaplains to kill Japanese for the greater glory of God. He himself carried a tommy-gun. The whole situation was in a muddle of thinking and sadly needed leadership. Some men objected that they could not reconcile Christianity with war—would get on with the war now and think about Christianity after it was over. After the battles I found men flocked to church services.

SOCIALISM AND PARLIAMENT.

Marcus Graham, writing in Man, San Franciso, June 1935, says of part one of this work :

"The subject undertaken by Aldred is one of vast importance, especially so to those millions of workers in every part of the world who have been giving and in many instances still continue doing so, their moral, material, and very often even risking their lives in the aiding of all those triumphs that the Socialists have achieved in the parliaments of the world. The historian, who will in future undertake to do full justice to this important subject will undoubtedly fulfil one of the greatest needs in the literature depicting the social and political struggle of the oppressed and exploited masses. The pamphlet of Aldred ought to serve as sort of foundation upon which an historian should be able to bring forth such a work.

"Aldred has gathered a mass of evidence, factual proofs to substantiate his conclusions, that; every governmental or parliamentary triumph of the Socialist movement in any part of the world has terminated in disillusion, disappointment and actual treachery to the very interests of those workers who were to benefit from the achieved victories. No sincere socialist or student of the struggle for justice can very well afford to ignore or miss this pamphlet.

"Aldred's work falls short only of becoming a complete historical account for two reasons: First, the mistake of amassing too many facts of one given country (Great Britain), the inclusion of many insignificant events, and chiefly the needless length to which Aldred resorts in giving details of certain issues being dealt with. The second defect of the pamphlet lies in not dealing at all, or very little, with the activities of the Socialist victories in every part of the world.

"Another defect that mars the value of the pamphlet lies in Aldred's attempt to inject himself, just as Upton Sinclair is so want of doing, on every occasion.

"Despite these defects, it remains a pamphlet worth the while of one's study and perusal."

Every student of politics should read Socialism and Parliament, Parts I and II. Each part is 6d., post-free 8d. The two parts cost Is. 4d., post free. Only a limited stock remains. Order now!

MOTHERWELL

The Motherwell Bye-election, and the defeat of the war Labourist, supported by the Tories and the local "Communists," has roused considerable local feeling in the ranks of the Militarists. The result is not a victory for Scots Nationalism but a decided and wholesale challenge to the idea of boroughmongering which now stalks abroad almost without question in these dreary days of purposeless and unwise coalition.

In the course of the election, our comrade, W. E. Currie, raised the case of Pte. Lambert, mentioned in the April issue of this journal.

Things were pretty quiet during the election, and there were no signs of the unexpected result, until the evening of Sunday, April 11, when the Communist Party held a "Mass Meeting," with flags, banners, and ladies' pipe band in the cause of "Labour, Unity, and Progress."

An open-air meeting addressed by Oliver Brown caused a temporary "hold up" in the progress of the procession on its way to the Town Hall. During the meeting in the Town Hall addressed by "Communists" Cregan and Gollan, Oliver Brown challenged the C.P. to a debate but they refused to face up to his challenge. The excuse that they objected to book the Hall for Brown's "benefit" was true in a sense, especially when we know that the C.P. and Labour Party agents between them monopolised all Town Hall bookings right up to polling day in order to crush out McIntyre. The refusal of the C.P. to accept the challenge caused an outburst of disapproval.

Two weeks before, Comrade Currie had a similar experience when allegations were made by the S.P.G.B. (Hamilton) against his activities and his association with Pacifists like Bedford, Aldred, and Rhys Davies.

Comrade Currie intimated that he was prepared to defend our position if given the opportunity and was informed by letter from the secretary of the S.P.G.B. later, that his challenge to Public Debate could only be accepted providing he was "a bona fide member of a Political Party recognised by the S.P.G.B."

Of course no "bona fides" are requested by the S.P.G.B. when conducting their campaign of slander and abuse.

It is only when there is a danger of a counter attack that they discover that a "bona fide" shelter might afford the best protection in an emergency. Currie prefers to remain a free Socialist, free to speak and to act in accordance with his beliefs, rather than become a mechanical robot of a party constitution.

The Ex-Service Men's Union, of which comrade W. E. Currie is the active secretary, took up, not only the case of Pte. Lambert, but also that of Connor. The latter case roused such public resentment throughout Lanarkshire that James Patrick, election agent for Alexander Anderson, the Labour candidate, published a "disclaimer" against his "Communist" Allies in the Motherwell "Times" on April 6. This read as follows:—

Sir,—It has come to my notice that certain groups of people have organised public meetings which, according to the advertisements, are alleged to be in support of the Labour candidate in the present by-election.

As election agent to Treasurer Alex. Anderson, the Labour candidate, I entirely disclaim any responsibility for such meetings which have been organised without my consent or knowledge.

To those responsible I would point out that, to in any way solicit votes, or support for a candidate in an election, without the written consent of the candidate's agent is regarded as a corrupt and illegal practice under the Representation of the People Act, of 1918.

Those guilty of such a practice render themselves liable to the heavy penalties enumerated in the Act. —Yours, etc.,

JAMES PATRICK.

Even the disclaimer could not undo the evil effect of the unholy alliance on the bye-election. Walton Newbold once won Motherwell for Moscow, as Zinoviev shouted! "Communists" lost it for official Labour!

While congratulations are pouring in to Dr. McIntyre, Motherwell comrades are convinced that Oliver Brown was one who made victory certain—by his bold challenge to the "Communists." His challenge to those enemies of the common people, and his tracking down and exposure of the alleged 'Socialists,' was an example of forthright speech that appealed to all who really want to see the dawn of decent society. Unfortunately, McIntyre at Westminster, despite his challenging beginning, will go the way of all parliamentary flesh.

Hamilton Man In Soviet Prison

Efforts are being made by the Foreign Office to obtain a reduction in the sentence of one year's hard labour passed by the Soviet authorities at Murmansk on February 21 last, on a Scottish merchant seaman, John Connor, c/o McVey, 50 Auchinraith Avenue, Whitehill, Hamilton.

In a letter to Mrs. Connor, the 19-year-old wife of the seasman, the Foreign Office states that, according to their information, Connor was arrested by the Soviet police on January 9 last on a charge of drunkenness and disorderly conduct. The six weeks he had served before being sentenced would be counted towards the sentence of one year's hard labour.

The first indication Mrs. Connor received that her husband was in trouble was contained in a letter from the owners of the ship in which he was serving. The owners stated that they had received information from the master of the ship that Connor had got himself into trouble with the police of the U.S.S.R. on January 9, and had been detained since that time. It was added that Mrs. Connor would receive no further allotment.

The Lanarkshire Branch of the Scottish Union of Ex-Service Men and Women, of which our comrade, W. E. Currie, is Secretary, have taken up the matter with the Foreign Office and the Soviet Ambassador in London.

The "Hamilton Advertiser," in its issue for April 7, published a letter from our comrade, A. Callaghan, secretary of Burnbank Anarchist Group, protesting against the sentence.

Callaghan says with truth:—

This very harsh sentence, if imposed on any Communist in Britain would have caused a Party crusade throughout the country. What is the answer to this measure of Soviet justice? While we know that harsh sentences (e.g. two women sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for stealing vegetables from a Moscow allotment) are the rule, we did think that an allowance would have been made to a man who had already risked his life on a convoy taking supplies to Russia.

The Labour and Socialist Movement is international to the core. We are against national and racial, as well as class, barriers. We stand for economis organisation, social justice and freedom, not only within one country but throughout the world." —Arthur Henderson, at Labour Party Annual conference, October, 1933.

Dear Comrade.—These words marked the occasion of the famous resolution which unanimously pledged the Labour Party to take no part in war and to resist it with the whole force of the Movement.

The Party has strayed far since then from forthright opposition to war and from its fundamental internationalism. Doubtless it was your realisation that this would happen that caused you as a pacifist to leave the Party so long ago. Members of this Fellowship have shared your disappointment and disapproval and have not remained in membership without heart-searching. But we have been unwilling to surrender the field completely to those responsible for the change.

We have sought to keep alive the basic idealism of the Movement; to combat the worst effects of the war upon the temper and policy of the Movement; to provide a rallying ground for those concerned to win the Party back to International Socialism.

We believe the time has arrived for an earnest effort in this direction. Already the drift towards "Vansittartism" has awakened the opposition of many Party members, even many non-pacifists. As Jim Middleton said in his farewell speech to the Party:—

I have done many things for the Party, but one thing I will not do—I am not going to take lessons in socialism or internationalism from Lord Vansittart or anyone like him.

Harold Laski in his Presidential Address said:—

As socialists we are hostile to any effort at a peace of revenge. We denounce with indignation the purveyors of hate, even when they pose as socialists.

In this situation we believe it is essential that all pacifists who are socialists should be united in seeking to redirect the policy of the Labour Party, the only effective political expression of the workers of this country, towards the basic ideals and principles upon which it was founded. We believe this can be done effectively only from within.

We seek your co-operation. We ask you to consider rejoining the Party and linking yourself in active membership with this Fellowship. We shall welcome inquiries from every reader of "The Word."

Yours fraternally,

E. C. REDHEAD,
Chairman.

TO C.O. READERS OF "THE WORD."

Dear Friends and Comrades,—You are conscientious objectors to military service—and to war. You think war is wrong. What are you doing to prevent another war?

Unless your conscience is very limited, you will be conscious of widespread poverty and suffering which can be abolished. What are you going to do about it?

You, as C.O.'s, owe to the community, past and present, your conscience and your present status.

War and poverty can only be abolished by political action. We suggest that as Conscientious Objectors —and as citizens—you ought, therefore, to take an active part in politics. This means joining a political party. The only party which has any real chance of obtaining a just social order is the Labour Party. It is the Party of the People and the organ for their political expression.

It doesn't matter if you disagree with some of its policy; so do we! Come inside and help us! By yourself you are helpless.

Join the Labour Party and Labour Pacifist Fellow-

THE THREE GRAVE DIGGERS OF YALTA

By C. H. NORMAN

The three men who composed the Yalta memorandum showed that the spirit which animated Mr. Lloyd George, President Wilson and M. Clemenceau at Versailles was the predominant element in governing their proceedings. Marshal Foch said in 1919 that the term about the Polish Corridor made certain a continuation of the war in due time. In September, 1919, Mr. Lloyd George declared that the full effects of the Treaty of Versailles would be felt by the world in 20 years' time. The world did, almost to the day, in September, 1939! The three confidents at Yalta declared their intention of hamstringing Germany, with a strangle-hold greater than that applied in 1919 at Versailles: though one of the chief actors on the Allied side at Versailles, Mr. Lloyd George had stated in the House of Commons in August, 1939, that the situation then facing Europe had been caused by the Allied Powers breaking all the pledges made to Germany in the relevant clauses of the Versailles Treaty, a remarkable speech which was almost completely boycotted at the time, being regarded merely as an example of the delayed-action working of Mr. Lloyd George's conscience. Mr. Churchill has occasionally reminded the nation that war began by the declaration of war by England on Germany in 1939, in execution of the guarantee to Poland, was a continuation of the war of 1914-1918, which President Wilson and Mr. Lloyd George chose to describe in their recruiting orations as "the war to end war": though "The Daily News," oddly enough, on July 29, 1914, affirmed: "Not a British life shall be sacrificed for the sake of a Russian Hegemony of the Slav world."! Shades of Stalin!

Poland is a country which has always been in trouble. There is an interesting passage in Hamlet, Act IV., Scene IV., on the subject, showing that even in Shakespeare's time, the Polish question was disturbing the Continent of Europe. The scene is described as "A Plain in Denmark." Prince Fortinbras of Norway marching at the head of his army, speaks thus: "Go, Captain, greet the Danish king. Tell him that by his licence, Fortinbras claims the conveyance of a promised march over his kingdom." Then, after the exit of Fortinbras, Hamlet enters and asks the Captain: "Good sir, whose powers are these? They are of Norway, sir. How purposed, sir, I pray you? Against some part of Poland. Who commands them, sir? The nephew of old Norway, Fortinbras. Goes it against the main of Poland, or for some frontier? Truly to speak, we go to gain a little patch of ground that hath in it no profit but the name. To pay five ducats, I would not farm it. Why, then, the Polack never will defend it? Yes, 'tis already garrisoned." Whereupon Hamlet reflects: "Two thousand souls and twenty thousand ducats will not debate the question of this straw. This is the imposthume (abscess) of much wealth and peace that inward breaks and shows no cause without why the man dies."

The guarantee to Poland was given by the Chamberlain Government in 1939 to save the investments of large British financial interests (supported by United States' financial interests, which were Roosevelt's backers) in the Polish railways, in the Polish mines, and in the Polish port of Gydnia, which had been started by the Poles as a competitor to the German thousand year old trading centre of Danzig. The position has never been better put than in the words of the American writer, George Schreiner, in his introduction to the Collection of Diplomatic Documents covering the diplomatic history of the world for the ten years before the war of 1914 began, entitled "Entente Diplomacy of the World," published by M. B. de Siebert, Secretary of the Imperial Russian Embassy in London in 1921. "A small group invests money in some foreign land, for the sole purpose of private gain, and lays thereby, intentionally or unwittingly, the seed of diplomatic and armed conflict. The resulting war is not fought with the money and blood of the investors, but with the lives and treasure of the national aggregate whose government has thought it well to protect the speculator and the concessionary. For the sake of rescuing a small investment the government concerned will spend huge sums, throw away lives and face the necessity of having to tax its populations for generations, as has been done on so colossal a scale during the great war": and on an even more colossal scale during the war which began in 1939. Mr. Schreiner adds: "In the end, nothing has been achieved. Militarism may have been crushed in one country"—it certainly was not—"but to keep that militarism down a similar state of armed preparedness, and all it entails, has been established elsewhere."

It is clear that the various countries were arming against each other from about the year 1934 with varying degrees of efficiency in scientific development. In 1935 the British Government took control of all the aircraft production of the country, and, in 1937 the Board of Trade War Food Plans Defence Committee began authorising the great wholesale dealers in commodities of a non-perishable character to build up a five years store of food. In 1936, the German Government addressed a lengthy and detailed despatch to the British Government on the subject of the critical condition of affairs which was plainly developing in Central Europe. It was kept very quiet by the British Government at the time, but it is printed in the "Collection of Speeches and Documents on International Affairs, 1918-1937, edited by Prof. Borrodaile Keith (Oxford University Press), and described there as "The Peace Plan of the German Government, March 31st, 1936." Those very reasonable and far-reaching proposals of a practical nature were brushed aside in a very summary and legalistic manner by Mr. Anthony Eden in a despatch of May 6th, 1936, which made clear to the German Government (then headed by Herr Hitler), that the pacific proposals of the German Government were not in the least welcome to the British Government and the powers associated with the British Government, with the result that the German Government reached the conclusion that nothing could be gained by attempting negotiation on those lines. The Polish and other guarantees were entered into by Britain and war followed, a heavy responsibility resting upon the British Cabinet for its rough treatment of the German proposals.

Imperialism is a method of policy by which powerful nations which covet the vineyards of weaker nations contrive to secure control of the coveted vineyard. Some modern examples are:

[Specially drawn for "The Word" by "Gowrie."

"COME ON, COMRADE LABOUR, SING IT AS IF YOU MEANT IT."

Egypt, where the British Government obtained control of the Suez Canal: the South African Republics, whose independence was destroyed in the Boer War, so that control could be obtained over the gold mines in the Rand. The native races of Rhodesia were tricked out of their lands and rights so that control could be maintained over the copper mines there. Persia has been bullied alternately by Russia and Britain because of the rich oil supplies in that country, which is now under a joint Anglo-Russian military occupation. The real reason (apart from prestige) for the desire to re-occupy Burmah, where the English are certainly not wanted on their merits, is because of the ruby mines there and the oil supplies. The United States set up a puppet republic in Panama in 1904 when the time was ripe to embark on the construction of the Panama Canal, thus depriving the weak South American Republic of Colombia of a large province which was part of the Republic. Control has been maintained over the Republic of Nicaragua to the extent of occupying the capital town, Managua, by U.S. military forces to prevent any European or other government starting a rival canal to the Panama Canal. Spain was attacked by the United States in 1898 in order to obtain direct control of the island of Porto Rico and the Phillipine Islands, and indirect control over Cuba. The Hawaiian Islands were also seized by the United States as part of the policy of peaceful acquisition of strategical points in the Pacific. In 1916, Denmark was forced by President Wilson to sell its West Indian possession, the Virgin Islands, to the United States under threat of military occupation. Those islands, which were the best governed possession in the West Indies, have now sunk to the low standard of government represented in the best Indian possessions of France and Britain: while some assert that Porto Rico is worse governed under the United States than when ruled by Spain. Change of control does not mean improved government for the wretched victims of this pawn moving in the game of international imperialism.

The guarantees given in 1939 to Poland and Roumania were a facet of Imperialism, as they provided a convenient means for creating a cause of war against either Germany or Russia, should the circumstances arise when the British Government had decided to plunge Europe for a third time in a century into a general war in maintenance of what is described as "the balance of power." The war now proceeding against Germany with a view to the commercial destruction of that State (which was the real purpose of the British Government in entering for the second time into a war with Germany, following the line of Rome in the Punic Wars against Carthage) has brought into existence two great military powers in the shape of the United States and Russia. Great Britain, in destroying one danger to the balance of power—(which is based on the doctrine that no one shall interfere with the schemes of British Imperialism)—by trying to destroy Germany, with the help of the United States and Russia, has placed the Empire at the mercy of two States against which Britain could make little headway in a major dispute. Though the prospects for Germany look extremely bad at this time, it is to be noted that the Germans can justifiably point to the fact that the forces of three States or Empires, all larger in area and population than Germany, were required to defeat the German armies. Even with that overwhelming force in numbers, the war had to be waged (as so many British wars are, notably against the Boer Republics described by Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman, afterwards British Prime Minister, as waged by "the methods of barbarism," over eleven thousand Boer children dying in the British concentration camps) by the methods of concentrated air warfare against German and other cities by the Allied and United States air forces, a method not adopted in 1939 against English and Scottish cities by the German Air Force at a time when those cities were quite unprotected from air attack either on the ground or in the air. The following sentence is quoted from Sunday Pictorial, May 12th, 1940, describing an air raid on Nancy, in France, which, incidentally, has turned out hardly to be damaged at all, compared to the air damage done at Cologne and elsewhere in Germany. "Hitler's murder machines hurtle across the sky and death and destruction rain on the town of Nancy. Bomb after bomb was dropped mercilessly during constant and savage air raids. Helpless women and children were among the victims of this latest piece of criminal brutality." It may not sound so impressive when the sentence is thus re-written: "Churchill's and Roosevelt's murder machines hurtle across the sky and death and destruction rain on the towns of Lubeck and Hamburg. Bomb after bomb was dropped mercilessly in concentrated attacks during constant and savage air raids. Helpless women and children by the thousand were among the victims of this latest piece of criminal brutality." The United States Air Force has also distinguished itself by bombing neutral towns in Switzerland and Sweden and in the colonies of Portugal. It is rather hypocritical for U.S.A. statesmen to complain so much of the aggression of others, considering the methods of bombardment adopted by the United States Air Force in circumstances when no retaliation was possible against U.S.A. cities.

Some singular headlines can be quoted from old newspapers, showing the kind of stuff which has been passed off on the public for over five years by the "free and independent, democratic, uncensored British Press." Headlines in Sunday Pictorial of May 12th, 1940: "NOW WE'RE AT THEIR THROAT." "DUTCH GRAB BACK AIR BASE. SLAY EVERY NAZI THERE": "BRITISH ON VERGE OF GREATEST BATTLE IN HISORY": "ALLIES SMASHING BLOWS ON GERMAN AERODROMES.": "THE BEAST OF BERLIN WANTS TO DO THIS TO US." From the Daily Herald of June 17th, 1940: "REYNAUD RESIGNS. PETAIN (THEY SHALL NOT PASS) IS PREMIER": "SOVIET HAS PRESENTED ULTIMATUM TO ESTONIA AND LATVIA SIMILAR TO THE DEMANDS PRESENTED TO LITHUANIA."

In his "Searchlight on the European War, 1914-1918," the writer declared on page 152: "The British people were fed into the war: they were lied to through the war: and they were lied into the peace. A crooked war ended in a twisted peace." History is repeating itself in exact detail. The policy of the knock-out blow, initiated by Mr. Lloyd George in the last war so that he could wrest the Premiership from Mr. Asquith, who was inclining towards peace by negotiation, was successful only in one thing—in making inevitable the war that is proceeding by slow degrees to its confused termination. The policy of the knock-out blow or "unconditional surrender" adopted at Yalta will also only be successful in the respect that it will lay a third generation in a premature grave in Europe. The three leading political figures of Great Britain, Russia and the United States in the past four years have shown themselves not unskilled in procuring the butchery of their own countrymen, women and children, by land, sea, and air—a strange return for the high rewards they receive as supposed experts in the art of good government—by pressing on the war against all reason and sense of humanity. So badly do they govern at home that in Britain even a few thousand children cannot be protected from cruel abuse: while Mr. Roosevelt has gone to his grave without checking (or even protesting against) the peculiar practice in the United States of roasting the negro. Indeed the practice is extending, judging from this extract from the Daily Herald, March 12th, 1945: "To-day the Gurkhas have been pouring boiling oil and petrol into the tunnels and frying the Japs alive": conduct which may explain why the Japanese are not moved by the "atrocity" campaign against them. The Archbishop of York, in the House of Lords, on March 20th, 1945, quoted a crime related to him as happening in Holland, without date, place, or other reference, in the words: "They told me of a boy ten years old, who was deliberately beaten to death in cold blood." (On that very day the papers announced that Mr. Justice Wrottesley had sentenced an English farmer to six years penal servitude for beating a boy named O'Neill to death). The Archbishop then proceeded to advocate the murder of Herr Hitler and his associates in this unvarnished language: "I should like to see these people outlawed, so that there would be no public trial, and those who caught them, when their identity was established, should at once put them to death." (House of Lords Debates, column 672, Tuesday, 20th March, 1945). Someone might undertake the somewhat arduous task of converting the Archbishop of York to Christianity. The Archbishop is something of a war criminal himself in making these demands, considering the repercussion statements of this kind are likely to have on the treatmennt of British prisoners of war in the hands of the Germans and the Japanese, which has already been the subject of bitter complaint. Each country should deal with its own war criminals. It is a scandal to any form of justice that persons should be tried by tribunals composed of their enemies. It is regrettable that distinguished English judges (true in their old age when judgment wavers) should agree to sit upon such tribunals. As Mr. Young put it in The Sunday Times, 18th February, 1945: "I can hardly take up a paper without reading that somewhere in this tormented Europe a fresh batch of men, women and schoolboys have been sent to the slaughter-yard: sometimes on no stated charge at all, sometimes on charges which no civilised court of justice could ever entertain. One day it is France: another day it is Bulgaria: every day it is Jugo-Slavia and Poland," to which one can add Russia. This is a result of the policy thus described in the "New Statesman," February 17th, 1945: "Remember that for three years the B.B.C. has told members of the resistance forces throughout Europe to kill collaborators. We have even told then in detail how to kill and how to strip and make use of the clothes and arms of collaborators as well as Germans." To-day, in Germany, the Allied military commanders are searching everywhere to find Germans who will collaborate with them to carry on a civil government, which the Allies are quite unable to maintain, unaided by the Germans, at the high standard set by the Germans themselves. It is all the more curious when one recalls that Field-Marshal Smuts is the greatest collaborator of them all. He was a subject of a republic whose independence was destroyed by Britain, but he is now the head of the State governing those very territories as part of the British Empire. If General Smuts cannot rightly be described as the leading Quisling of them all, language has no meaning. And the same remark is true of all the Indians who collaborate with the British Government in India in maintaining that alien government whose purpose was described in recent times as "to bleed India and the Indians." (Lord Salisbury and Lord Brentwood).

It is entertaining to know that a country as mis-governed as Britain is with its degraded slum population, should be undertaking to "educate" the Germans! The following comparative criminal statistics for the two countries are extracted from "The Statesman's Year Books" for 1927 and 1938. In England and Wales in 1925, out of a population of 38,807,050, the number of convicted persons was 527,040, and in 1936, with a population of 40,839,000, the number of convicted persons rose to 817,873. In Germany in 1924, with a population of 63,118,972, the number of persons convictetd after trial was 767,580, in 1925, it was 592,051, and in 1936, when the population rose to 66,030,481, the number of convicted persons was 385,400. Those figures would suggest that it is the English who require educating in good behaviour rather than the Germans. The improvement in this respect under the Hitler regime certainly does not fit in with the representations made concerning the state of morality in that country, unless the explanation is that the people expelled from Germany did contain an unusually large proportion of those with unlawful tendencies. On the question of how Germany is governed in the interests of the people, every visitor must be struck with the absence of slums and the general orderliness and cleanliness of the cities. In describing the capture of Cologne, the Daily Herald correspondent on March 7th, 1945, stated: "In Ehrenfeld, a suburb, which we badly bombed, there is hardly a window out of several acres of workmen's luxury modern flats." It would be difficult to find anywhere in Britain anything that could be described as a "workman's luxury modern flat." The accounts reaching England of the looting by Russian, American and British soldiers in Germany would indicate a much higher standard of life for the ordinary working population under the Hitler regime than exists in England or elsewhere in Europe, except in Sweden, and, perhaps Switzerland. The standard of education which will be introduced into Germany will be that dictated by the slum mind of the British War Office and the ancient British Universities. The truth is that, on social grounds, a defeat of Germany, as did the defeat of Napoleon in 1815, will re-establish reaction in Europe for fifty years. However, perhaps things will not turn out as anticipated by the Allied and Associated Powers any more than the following forecast can take effect: "F. D. R. here in the Spring. He may take part in the Inter-Allied Victory March down the Mall. Mass Review in Hyde Park." Evening Standard headlines, February 22nd, 1945. Death is always at hand to correct the egotism of human beings. And one of the gravediggers of Yalta certainly dug his own grave, through his egotism in claiming the American Presidency at a time when, had he a proper regard for the interests of the American community, he would have recognised he was physically unfit to stand for another term as President of the United States. Trotsky, himself a victim of the terrorism he encouraged, foretold in 1939 that, by the time the war ended, all the original issues would have disappeared, and all those in authority at the beginning would have vanished from the stage. The three gravediggers of Yalta have certainly contributed towards bringing this grim prophesy to fruition.

us for publishing Tom Brown's letter in the April "Word," etc. Lohr's letter will appear next month. We will review then the trial. We agree with what Comrade says of the "War Commentary" report. In essential details, that report suppresses the factual truth. No Anarchist journal should publish a report that gives a false view of the proceedings. The waste of money on lawyers, the cowardly defence, and then the platform mockery of defiance that was never intended, total up to a disgraceful behaviour that ought not to be tolerated in the Anarchist movement Anarchists should be outstanding witnesses for truth, even when it tells against them.—Ed.]

THE METHODS OF BARBARISM

A REAL ATROCITY OF AIR WARFARE

The following is a translation of an article appearing in the Swiss paper, the Basle News, dated 20th September, 1943, giving an example of the results of the concentrated bombing of German and other continental cities carried out by the Anglo-American Air Forces. Some British people, but few, have protested against the calculated ferocity of the Anglo-American air warfare, to which there has been no parallel in Britain in the attacks by air on British cities. No one can pretend that anything like what is recorded in this article by a neutral Swiss observer has occurred in any British city. Indeed, at a time when the German Air Force had undoubtedly the upper hand in the air, between September, 1939 and June, 1940, practically no attack of any consequence was made upon British cities by the German Air Force. That is a fact. Now that the British Government is whipping up feeling by circulating stories concerning the crimes committed in the Buchenwald and other camps by German Nazi camp officers on Germans interned in those camps, it is well to remind ourselves of the realities concerning the atrocious conduct of the war in the air since 1943 by the Anglo-American Air Forces of which this article is an example.—C. H. Norman.

The article says:

Baseler Nachrichten, 20th Sept., 1943.

During the bombing of Hamburg there was a catastrophe in one densely populated part of the town of several square kilometres which eclipsed all previous happenings of the bombing war. It occurred as a result of the area being covered with mines, high-explosives and phosphorous bombs and hundreds of thousands of ordinary incendiaries.

It must be emphasised that the effect was one which can only be achieved when bombing densely populated residential districts, but not when bombing factory districts. Every physicist of the air war could have calculated this effect in advance if the number of H.E. and incendiary bombs to be dropped on a given area were known to him. It is founded on the well-known fact that every open fire sucks in the oxygen it needs from the surrounding atmosphere and that large fires, unless there is a strong wind, will lead to the creation of so-called air chimneys up which the flames will rush with ever-increasing force. If the area of the fire covers several square kilometres, then the flames licking out of individual rows and blocks of houses will combine into one big blanket of fire, covering the entire area and rushing up to ever greater heights. According to English reports, the Hamburg fire reached a height of six kilometres, that is, up to that height the heat rose in one compact body.

Under these conditions the following occurs: within the area of the fire a rush of air is created, reaching the strength of a typhoon. The effect is that of enormous bellows pumping air into this district from all directions; for the sea of flames sucks in air from its surroundings. In this, the streets serve as channels through which the air passes towards the centre and at the same time the air rushing through the streets sucks the flames from the burning houses horizontally into the streets. Thus, human beings and flames will compete for the available oxygen and, naturally, a fire of this size will get the better of it.

The immediate result in the cellars is a shortage of oxygen and breathing difficulties for the people present. At the same time the temperature in the shelters rises unbearably, but the people are prevented from leaving the shelters during the early stages of the bombing by the constant rain of H.E., incendiary and phosphorous bombs, which release a fine shower consisting of a mixture of rubber and phosphorous. Experience has shown that when the people finally make up their minds to leave the cellars it is too late. They have no strength left to carry out their decision, and even if they have they lack the strength to resist the heat and the lack of oxygen in the street. It is easy to see that men, with their greater power of resistance and stouter clothing, are better able to resist such a method of attack than women and children. That is why the majority of the victims are women and children. Numerous completely charred bodies of women and children in light summer clothing who emerged from the cellars into the storm of fire in the street were soon converted into burning torches.

Naturally, hundreds and thousands of men too lost their lives in the streets of this district. Hamburg experts who are in charge of the salvaging of bodies have stated that only a minute percentage of the population residing there can have escaped with its life under the conditions prevailing during the attack. The whirlwind surrounded the entire district with a fiery wall and only those were able to save themselves who escaped at the very beginning.

The condition of the cellar shelters, which have meanwhile been opened, gives some indication of the temperature which must have prevailed in the streets. The people who remained in these rooms were not only suffocated and charred but reduced to ashes. In other words, these rooms which, without exception, became death-chambers for dozens and hundreds of people, must have reached a temperature such as is not reached in the burning chamber of a crematorium. One doctor who supervised the salvage of the bodies remarked that the incineration of the bones had in many cases been more complete in the cellars than it is in the normal process of cremation. Obviously, it is impossible to identify the bodies, as all the belongings of the people have also been reduced to ashes.

The 20,000 bodies salvaged so far in Hamburg come mainly from this district. Even to-day the work of salvaging is still extremely difficult because the temperature in the cellars a fortnight after the fire is still such that any introduction of oxygen makes the fire flare up again.

The many reports of survivors of burning women and children, and of women throwing their children into canals, are, therefore, not invented. How great was the temperature prevailing in these streets is further proved by the fact that the glass in the windows and metal frames were reduced to ash and cinders.

As we have said, all this occurred in a strictly defined district of some kilometres square. Obviously, effects like those described can only be achieved in densely populated residential districts with high houses and relatively narrow streets. The streets, however, need not be very narrow, for roughly 50 women and children were found suffocated, half charred, and with their clothing torn from their bodies by the storm, on a playing field which was situated at the centre of a street crossing. It appears, therefore, that the air war in this form can indeed turn entire districts of a large city, and, above all, the residential quarters of workers and employees, into a fiery grave which no one can escape who has not the courage to flee in the early stages through the rain of phosphorous, H.E. and incendiary bombs.

(This account outstrips even the horrors of the Buchenwald and other camps, only it has not been printed in the British Press, as it is the Anglo-American Bomber Command and Mr. Churchill's Government which is responsible for this aerial abomination, not the Germans. It is hardly worth boasting about a victory won by such methods.)

WAR COMMENTARY TRIAL

In the April "Word" we published the Press Association report of the

(1) Second Police Court hearing of this case, Friday March 16; and

(2) The formal third Police Court hearing, when the four accused were committed to the Old Bailey for trial.

Last month we published the very full P.A. report of the trial. We were unable to include the last day's proceedings. This appears below.

"The Word" is the only paper in the country to publish a clear and correct report of this case. The Capitalist Press accounts were inadequate. "The War Commentary" gave a false account of the trial on essential points. This was done to cover up the contemptible attitude of the defence.

We are unable to deal with the question this month. The matter is most important to the working-class movement and we shall deal with the case thoroughly in our next issue. We promise to cover every aspect of this most unsatisfactory case. Until then we refrain from further comment.—Ed.

The concluding stages were reached at the Old Bailey on Thursday, April 26, in the case in which three men and a woman have pleaded not guilty to having conspired to endeavour to seduce from their duty persons in H.M. Forces and to cause among them disaffection, likely to lead to breaches of their duty.

Mr. and Mrs. Richards have pleaded not guilty to having in their possession a poem called "Fight? What For?" which the Judge described on Wednesday as doggerel, and all the accused have pleaded not guilty to having in their possession or under their control a circular letter of such a nature that its dissemination would constitute a contravention of Regulation 39a.

Vernon Richards and Hewetson denied in evidence the charges against them. Mrs. Richards and Sansom did not give evidence.

Mr. Justice Birkett, in his summing up, which was listened to by a crowded court, reminded the jury that the accused were not charged with acting together to propagate anarchy.

Mr. John Maude, K.C. (for Vernon Richards and Hewetson), had stressed the fact that these people honestly believed the doctrines they preached, and that what had been done was not for money or mercenary motives. He had also suggested that the ideals that these people preached might be characterised as noble. The Attorney-General, on the other hand, had suggested they were sheer fantasy.

"All I say—all I say," remarked the Judge, "is that none of these things really affects the issue. Honesty, righteousness, sincerity, in propagating doctrines, if it be a breach of the law, cannot be an excuse."

The Judge added that the jury must not expect him to present a reasoned short statement on the philosophy of anarchy. Its simple doctrine seemed to be that all the familiar institutions which together made up a State—the police, the church, the law—were to go, and to be replaced by a society of men and women who were to conduct the affairs of this nation, and indeed the world, on some principles of mutual agreement.

No doubt it was sincerely held, and while some people might hold the view that it was a very noble, practical ideal, others might consider it sheer utter fantasy.

The circular letter dated October 25 was a special circular letter for soldiers, and they would ask themselves what was the necessity for such a letter for soldiers. The defence said that while that was true it was not to try ot seduce the soldiers from their duty.

Mr. Justice Birkett concluded by saying that it was in the highest degree important that the jury should put aside their own feelings and thoughts and concentrate on the evidence.

"It is in the highest degree important," he continued that people like these should feel that they have had a fair trial. They have said the law must go. I do not know, I am sure. After the devoted work of the leaders of the Bar, and indeed the junior members of the Bar on their behalf, whether that view will be in anyway modified. It is a matter of very great importance in a case of this kind, which might quite possibly excite very strong feeling in time of war, that the administration of justice should be untouched and serene.

"If you feel with regard to any of these accused a reasonable doubt that the case has not been made out say so and acquit them. If, on a review of all the evidence, you feel there is no reasonable doubt you should say so quite fairly without fear or favour to anybody. It is the only way the administration of the law can live and survive."

The jury were absent for one hour and fifty-five minutes which included the lunch adjournment of an hour and ten minutes.

They found Mrs. Richards not guilty on all counts and the Judge ordered her discharge.

Mrs. Richards half hesitated and turned looking towards her husband when she reached the doorway leading from the dock to the public court.

Richards was found guilty of conspiracy and of endeavouring to cause disaffection by disseminating copies of "War Commentary." He was also found guilty of having possession of the circular letter but not guilty of being in possession of the poem.

Hewetson was found guilty of conspiracy, endeavouring to cause disaffection by disseminating "War Commentary" and having a circular letter in his possession.

Sansom was found guilty of possessing the circular letter. He was found not guilty on the direction of the Judge of endeavouring to cause disaffection by disseminating copies of "War Commentary." Also not guilty of the other two counts against him.

Det.-Insp. Whitehead stated that Richards was given a good character by his employers. His last appointment had a salary of £600 a year which was reduced to £350 owing to part-time work. Hewetson's salary was £350 with residential emoluments. He had filled positions with success from the medical point of view and was a reliable and conscientious worker.

The Inspector stated that Sansom had two previous convictions, one for improperly obtaining a greatcoat from a soldier and the other for not notifying a change of address. In 1943 Sansom left his wife and child and had not supported them since. He was educated at Plaistow Secondary School and West Ham School of Art and had been employed as commercial artist, decorator, tractor driver and gardener. At the time of his arrest he was evading military service.

Mr. John Maude, K.C., read two testimonials on Hewetson's behalf. The Dean of the British Post-Graduate Medical School, London University, paid tribute to his excellent service as a casualty officer. Professor Turner, Professor of Surgery, London University, described Hewetson as conscientious and thorough and his work as most satisfactory.

Vernon Richards, Hewetson and Sansom were each sentenced to nine months' imprisonment on each count of which they were found guilty, sentences to run concurrently.

Passing sentence, Mr. Justice Birkett said that the accused could not expect from him anything more than what was strictly within his duty, but they would appreciate that the case was an important one, and that issues were grave as indeed was shown by the penalties imposed by the regulations.

"I have a public duty to perform," the Judge added. "I cannot indulge private views or whims or sympathise with this or that or the other. When I sit here I sit to try to embody public justice—what is right to you and right."

Although the views they expressed might seem strange to many people, the Judge was quite ready to believe that they were actuated at all times by high motives pursuing the ideals in which they believed. The last thing he wanted to do was to impose sentences which would in any sense be crushing; but he must vindicate the law and he could not make any distinction between them.

ANARCHIST ACTIVITY

Dear Comrade,—The only reply to my detailed accusations against Richards and Co and their coup d'etat of Freedom Press is a vague general denial in "War Commentary" of April 21. None of my charges is referred to by name.

It has been suggested that I ought not to have chosen the present time to make the charges. The choice of time is not mine. My letter to "The Word" was dated February 15, 1945. Hichards and Hewetson dissolved the Editorial Board by letter dated January 6, 1945.

I hear it rumoured that some persons hundreds of miles away from London had access to the account books of Freedom Press. I was a member of the E.B. of "War Commentary" from its foundation until January, 1945; I never had access to the books. Let me support my statements by quotations from the minute book of the London Anarchist Federation.

MEETING HELD FEBRUARY 20, 1944.

"Report on Express Printers; V. Richards pointed out the danger in giving a detailed report, in case of the defection of any member, who would then be in a position to give away much valuable information. It was suggested that the 3-monthly interim report should be just a report on general progress of work and financial situation; and it would give the treasurer (Richards) a chance to bring to the notice of the A.F. any sudden developments, adverse or otherwise. The 6-monthly report was to be a little fuller, but no details to be given. No records to be made in the minutes."

(The handwriting is that of our comrade T. W. Brown).

On April 16, 1944, a financial report was given, brief—as promised. Four months passed without a report and the minutes of the meeting held August 6, 1944 read:

"Agenda, Financial Report (deferred)."

Later—"Item 5; Financial Report not being up-to-date it was agreed to postpone it to the next meeting."
(Handwriting—Albert Meltzer).

The next meeting (September 3, 1944) is reported: "Freedom Press and A.F. Financial Report deferred."
(Handwriting—G. Green).

The next meeting was held on October 1, 1944, and the minute book records:

"Freedom Press and A.F. Financial Report had to be deferred as comrade (V. Richards) from whom statement was expected had left meeting."

(Handwriting—G. G.).

At the following meeting held on October 15, 1944, Richards did not appear, but sent Sansom with a report of money collected for the A.F. only, without any Freedom Press details or accounts. The brief report was read by Sansom from a scrap of paper. He declared himself unable to answer any questions. The minute reads:

"L.B. objected to the brevity of the reports and intimated that she would curtail her subscriptions until a more detailed statement was forthcoming. The A.F. however, accepted the report in view of the fact that a full report was shortly due."

(Handwriting—Philip Sansom).

The next report was to be given to the meeting held on November 12, 1944. The minute of that date reads:

"Agenda, Item 3, Freedom Press—Detailed Financial Report."

But no report was fortcoming and the secretary recorded:

"As detailed Financial Reports of A.F. and Freedom Press were due in December it was decided to defer these items until that time."

(Handwriting—Ron Avery).

In December the police raided Freedom Press so we did not expect a detailed report. Richards did not attend the December meeting of the A.F., but at the Editorial Board he promised us a report from private notes the police had not taken, the report to be given to the January meeting of the A F. Instead, Richards refused to face the meeting and sent a letter announcing his coup d'etat instead.

For a long time I had been fighting th attempts of the Big Three (Richards, Hewetson and M. L. Berneri) to turn "War Commentary" into a paper of middle-class "intellectuals." Now they are having their way. Many examples could be quoted. I will quote one—the others are easy to find.

"War Commentary" of March 10, 1945, prints appreciatively a letter in defence of the Freedom Press. The letter is signed (with half a dozen others) by Reg. Reynolds, Ethel Mannin, Herbert Read and T. S. Eliot. Of the latter "War Commentary" had previously said:

> "Appreciating the social value of medieval Christianity, poets like T. S. Eliot reverted to the church and envisaged a Catholic society based on a theocratic hierarchy. When a direct struggle appeared between revolution and reaction, such poets found their position forced them to support the reaction and in the Spanish struggle both Eliot and Campbell adopted a pro-Franco attitude."
> GEORGE WOODCOCK in "War Commentary" Mid April, 1942.

It is not accidental that Richards and Co. hate the C.N.T.

Fifteen persons names appear in a letter attacking me. Some of the names amuse me. Jack Wade was the first person to give me details of the shady wangles at Express Printers, observed while he was employed there. S. W. Taylor I first met about five weeks ago. Lauri Hislam has never been a member of the A.F. Tom Earley I have never seen. Preston Clements and Robert Blum I have never heard of. I showed Fred Lohr the letter in "War Commentary," which also claimed his signature. He was astonished. He had never seen, much less signed the letter! He promised to write to "War Commentary" protesting. A typical bit of Berneri business.

It's lucky we have "The Word," else there would be no check on this shady business.

London, May 10, 1945. TOM BROWN.

A London Anarchist Comrade has written us a long letter in which he says:—

Your remarks about the "War Commentary" trial are more than justified. Unfortunately, although the Press Association account is the best I have seen, it misses out one or two things such as the statement made in evidence by a Ministry of Labour official that when M. L. Richards registered she stated that her job at the Express Printers was essential as she had to support a widowed mother and invalid brother! The London Group, although at that time supposed to control Express Printers was never, of course, informed that she was registered as the Manageress.

Anyway these militant fighters who stated in Glasgow that they "would not detract one word or go back one inch in surrender to the dictatorial forces of the state" stand condemned from their own mouths. The account of the case in "War Commentary" is the most blatant bit of hypocrisy I have ever seen.

[We have received a letter from F. Lohr denouncing

THE SUPREME COURT CHALLENGED

By LOWELL H. COATE, M.A., Ph.D.

(Superintendent, the Humanist Society of Friends, U.S.A.)

With keen and growing interest we followed the attitude of the press upon the Supreme Court's decision in the Macintosh case (July 1931). The veritable blast of outspoken opposition to the decision in general, and particularly so on the part of the religious press, gives splendid reassurances that the people of this country will refuse to allow the state to invade the sacred precincts of conscience. In fact, it is suggested by one editor that this decision may serve to arouse the country to the importance of the issue as the famous Dred Scott decision before the Civil War aroused public opinion and focused it upon the inalienable rights of the black man.

The Baptists take proper pride in the fact that their most illustrious fellow-communicant, Chief Justice Hughes, read the dissenting opinion in which he declared that "The essence of religion is belief in relation to God involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation."

Turning to the religious press of the country we find much stronger sentiment much more critically expressed.

See comments in The American Friend, June 23, 1931.

"It would deny citizenship to Christ." Thus a minister denounced the ruling of the Supreme Court in the case under discussion.

"It is an issue between Christ and Mars," observes another.

"If Jesus were here today and applied for American citizenship, He would be politely informed that He was not eligible," said the Rev. George A. Crapullo, pastor of the Irving Square Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn. "On the basis of the Supreme Court decision Jesus would be denied citizenship because He recognised loyalty to God and humanity as being higher than loyalty to the state."

One reason why the Christian minister "cannot easily remain silent on this momentous opinion from the highest court in the nation," said Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, pastor of the Riverside Baptist Church, is that the "four strongest names in the court stand out on the other side."

The New York Times quotes him further thus:

The still further reason is that it announces in a particularly obnoxious form the doctrine of the nation's right to conscript conscience. Such is the duress and necessity of war that we have gradually surrendered practically all our rights in the presence of it.

The nation in war times will conscript our children, conscript our property, conscript our business. There is no doubt of that now, and no one of us will be able to prevent it.

Has the nation, however, so taken the place of God Almighty that it can conscript our consciences?

Let this be publicly and frankly spoken: If Professor Macintosh is not fit to be a citizen, then we are not fit to be citizens, for we most certainly will not support a war which we think is morally wrong.

"We have opened our doors to a good deal of the rifraff from Europe," said Dr. Malcolm MacLeod in the Collegiate Church of St. Nicholas (Reformed):

But a man who follows his conscience, a man who is considered worthy to train young men for the ministry in a great historic institution, a woman who risked her life helping our wounded soldiers in France, these are undesirable citizens; they are a menace to our Government.

An answer to the delicate question of loyalty is given by Professor Jerome Davis, a colleague of Dr. Macintosh.

In his address opening the exercises of the 109th anniversary of the Yale Divinity School, Professor Davis said that "every Christian must place loyalty to his conscience and to his God ahead of his country. We must rise above nationalism in following Christ."

The Moral Consideration.

Not since the Dred Scott case, in 1857, states The Christian Century,

Has the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a decision which so outrages the nation's conscience as does its refusal to grant citizenship to Professor D. C. Macintosh, of Yale Divinity School. . . . Anyone who imagines that the decision of the Court can be long endured as the fundamental law of the United States wholly misjudges the quality of the national conscience.

Large multitudes of our most loyal and enlightened citizens are condemned, by this decision, to live in a state of conscious moral hostility and antagonism to the constitution of their country. Their only remaining alternative is to adopt the method of passive resistance as a protest to the whole situation, as many minority groups have done in the past, such as voluntarily renouncing their right of franchise, and refusing to vote at all, and some even proposed renouncing their citizenship, preferring to be classed with those men who have declined naturalisation, rather than with the majority of the Court who were responsible for declining it.

In discussing the moral effects of the decision, The Christian Century insists that every private citizen, whether native born or naturalised, is caught in the same net. It says further, that:

He enjoys the protection of the nation on the tacit assumption of his true faith and allegiance to the constitution. He, therefore, tacitly consents to the conscription of his conscience and the degradation of his God which this decision now makes an inherent principle of the constitution. The thing is morally preposterous and intolerable. It is a denial of our history. It is subversive to our most precious idealism—the ideal of a free state resting upon the uncoerced conscience of a free people.

"One cannot speak of religious liberty," says Justice Hughes, in his dissenting opinion, "with proper appreciation of its essential and historic significance, without assuming a belief in supreme allegiance to the will of God."

The Supreme Court now definitely reverses this history and scorns this priceless tradition. It stretches over all its citizens the pagan panoply of a nationalistic God before whom all must bow in reverence.

We say again that it is monstrous. The conscience of American citizenship has never been subjected to a more gross outrage by its government. To submit to it involves a vital change in the very theory of our democracy. But more than that, it means the inevitable death of spiritual religion. Does anyone imagine that the worship of a spiritual God can be sustained in a society whose members do not merely face the contingency that their government might, conceivably, at some time exercise a tyrannous control over their consciences, but who deliberately acquiesce in a constitutional provision which endows the government with the power to do so? Can the worship of a spiritual God be sincere where his worshippers are given in advance a pledge to abjure when His will comes into conflict with the will of Congress? This is tyranny in its worst form. It is not merely that kind of tyranny which emerges in a crisis; it is tyranny that is woven into the very structure of government and consented to by its citizens. That the American spirit will accept it supinely is unthinkable. . . .

The single feature which arrests attention at the moment is the fact that the court's decision writes into the constitution a principle of tyranny which our fathers could not by any stretch of the imagination have been prevailed upon to accept. Will we, their sons, accept it? "The Christian Century," on its part, takes its place beside Dr. Macintosh. We refuse to accept the constitution as interpreted by this decision of the supreme court. Our conscience is not for sale. We give no government the power to conscript our religion. We refuse to bow down and worship the state. We refuse to bear arms or to aid in any way a war which we believe to be contrary to the will of God. This may be treason—it is not for us to say. But if it be treason let the defenders of tyranny make the most of it.

Differentiating between wilful and conscientious disobedience to the commands of government, The Baptist says:

"A fair test which conscience plays in the violation of the law is afforded by the degree of willingness on the part of the violator to suffer the penalty of his disobedience.

"In the event of another war it is likely, under the law as the Supreme Court has defined it, that the jails will be filled to overflowing. There may come a time when it will be a disgrace for a Baptist, with his spiritual heritage, to be out of jail."

Writing in the same paper, Jerome Davis, of Yale University, puts it this way:

Our ancestors founded this republic affirming their belief in God and liberty of of conscience. Now, in 1931 the Supreme Court refuses citizenship because the applicant upholds the most fundamental of our American traditions. This out-Prussianizes Kaiserism in its rigid insistence on blind, unthinking loyalty to the state. It would have been much more consistent to debar a Christian who would blindly promise to fight at any time in violation of his conscience and his disobedience to God. If this decision should stand, it would mean that the court would have debarred not only Washington, Jefferson, and Fosdick and Henry Sloan Coffin, but even Jesus of Nazareth; indeed, it is hard to see how any sincere, thinking follower of Jesus could be admitted. If patriotic leaders of the type of Dr. Macintosh are to be refused citizenship, it is a tragic commentary on the depths to which our patriotism has sunk. The Congress of the United States must change the law.

Another Presbyterian journal, The Advance, quotes with full approval the words of the well-known columnist, Heywood Broun, to the effect that the irreducible minimum of intelligent citizenship is to be found in the desire to pass personal judgment upon issues which may arise, and that "no sort of law or amendment can wipe out the human conscience."

The Congregationalist, in an editorial on the decision, poses the question of conscience so as to show just what war does to the spirit of man:

Is this country so military-mad that virtue and goodness and nobility should be thus spurned? The plain inference is that conscience is not wanted, or that it is not regarded as of prime importance, in those whom this country admits to citizenship; and that in the last analysis, this is a democracy of brute force and of fighting animals.

No country can be safe that flouts conscience or undervalues the moral intensity and integrity of its citizens.

"Outlawing the Civilised" is the characterisation made by the Gospel Messenger of the Church of the Brethren.

Three great Christian denominations, the Presbyterians, Methodists and the Disciples of Christ, in national assembly declared vigorously against what is characterised as the "morally monstrous and intolerable" doctrine enunciated by the Supreme Court.

The Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, representing more than thirty Protestant denominations, has declared:

We hold that our country is benefitted by having as citizens those who unswervingly follow the dictates of their consciences and who put allegiance to God above every other consideration, and that a policy of denial of naturalization to aliens of such character is contrary to the ideals of a nation into whose very structure the principle of political and religious liberty has been built.

From many so-called secular sources, similar expressions have been voiced. It would seem that instead of settling the issue, the Supreme Court has very definitely unsettled it and actually started something. In the words of the Christian Science Monitor:

No man can mortgage his conscience, nor can the state requisition it.

Some rather surprising and unexpected developments occurred as a direct result of the court's decision in the Macintosh case. Two results in particular became outstanding as they involved unexpected groups within the meaning of the decision. There were two points at which such persons were affected, namely, in the case of aliens applying for citizenship and in the case of citizens taking the oath of public office.

The court, we find, made a ruling which absolutely debars a Quaker, for example, from becoming a citizen of the United States, unless he announces the abandonment of the most distinctive tenet of his faith. Yet the Quakers, it is well known to everyone familiar with the history of the United States, have contributed more than their numerical proportion of our national leaders, including four members of the Continental Congress, two signers of the Declaration of Independence, and at least one member of the Philadelphia convention of 1787. One of the thirteen original states attributes its foundation to their first great leader, William Penn, and two others were largely colonised by their efforts.

Yet in reliance upon the decision of the district court in the Macintosh case(which the Supreme Court affirmed, several courts throughout the country rejected the applications for citizenship, for no reason other than their refusal to abandon the traditional Quaker attitude with respect to military service. Similar decisions are also reported in the case of other sects, such as the Mennonites.

The effect of the decision is not confined to aliens seeking citizenship. It applies also to every citizen who in assuming public office is required to take the oath of allegiance. In his dissenting opinion Chief Justice Hughes pointed out the essential identity of the citizenship oath and the oath required of all office-holders, state and federal, as follows :—

If the present decision means what it says, then henceforth no sincere Quaker, Dunker or Mennonite —no person opposed to warfare in general, or to some hypothetical future war in particular, may take either the naturalization oath or the oath of office, without either mental reservation or a deliberate sacrifice of his religious scruples. As the attorneys for Dr. Macintosh interpret the decision, if a promise to "defend the constitution" implies a willingness to bear arms contrary to the affiant's religious scruples in the one case, it must imply the same willingness in the other."

They declare that :

To say that Congress by implication has carefully protected the religious scruples of the office-holder and by a contrary implication from the same set of words has disregarded the religious scruples of an applicant for citizenship, is to state an absurdity. If one oath operates to exclude from citizenship persons with religious scruples against warfare, the other must operate to exclude them from public office. The fact that the question has never been raised with respect to office-holders can easily be explained. Many Quakers and members of other similar sects have held public office in the past, and, in order to qualify themselves, have taken oath or affirmation to support and defend the constitution of the United States. But until the announcement of the present decision, we think it safe to say that no one ever conceived that the taking of such an oath of office implied such a waiver of religious principles as it is now held to imply.

The same legal defenders also believe "That few, indeed, of our citizens could be relied upon to submit to a demand that they bear arms in a conflict which they sincerely believed to be contrary to the will of their creator. . . . Any conscientious Christian, of whatever denomination, when confronted in actual fact with the choice which the respondents made upon a hypothetical basis, would give the same answer."

(To be concluded.)

THOSE AWFUL QUAKERS

Richard Mather was born in England in 1596. He moved to Boston in order to gain religious liberty, and became one of the founders and interpreters of orthodox New England Congregationalism. A son was Increase Mather, born in 1639, who became president of Harvard but was fired. He wrote 150 books. Cotton Mather, his son, born 1663, was also a learned Congregational minister, author of 450 works. He believed in witchcraft. We give a choice gem from this Puritan grandson of one who went to New England in search of religious liberty, written early in his career (1682) :

To Ye Aged and Beloved, Mr. John Higginson,— There be now at sea a ship called Welcome, which has on board one hundred or more of the heretics and malignants called Quakers, with W. Penn, who is the chief scamp, at the head of them. The General Court has accordingly given sacred orders to Master Malachi Huscott of the brig Porpoise, to waylay the said Welcome slyly as near the Cape of Cod as may be, and make captive the said Penn and his ungodly crew, so that the Lord may be glorified and not mocked on the soil of this new country with the heathen worship of these people. Much spoil can be made by selling the whole lot to Barbadoes, where slaves fetch good prices in rum and sugar, and we shall not only do the Lord great service by punishing the wicked, but we shall make great good for His Minister and people.

Yours in the bowels of Christ.

PARLIAMENTARIANS AND FASCISM

WHEN THEY HONOURED MUSSOLINI

The assassination of Mussolini was described and commented upon in ribald bad-taste by the very journals that applauded his dictatorship in its heyday. We never honoured Mussolini but we are opposed to the war on his corpse. He and his friends ought to have been admitted to Switzerland. Applications for his surrender to the Allies, or to his Italian enemies, should have been made to the Swiss Government later and have been considered by an International Court. Even then the right of asylum might not have been respected. There would have been some suggestion of legal claim. Because Fascism does not respect political asylum, democracy ought not to flirt with assassins.

Mussolini may have met the fate he merited but those anxious to condemn him in death should recall past association.

In "The Word for July, 1941, Vol. II, No. 12, pp. 135-136, beneath the captions employed in this article, we reprinted from our previous paper, "The Commune," Vol. I, No. 2, June 1923, the paragraph recording how George V. conferred the Most Honourable Order of the Bath on Signor Benito Mussolini, on May 6, 1923. We quoted George V.'s tribute to Mussolini: "The wise leadership of a powerful statesman." We did not accept this dictum and were denounced by the Capitalist press for our refusal to swallow this indigestible tribute of the British monarch to the Italian dictator. Who was right?

We reproduce, also, MacDonald's tributes to Mussolini. Parliamentary Socialists might study these nauseating platitudes.

We refer our readers to this issue of "The Word," since we do not wish to reprint this article or to parody it.

On this page, we reproduce the one-time widely broadcast picture of King George V shaking hands with Mussolini. Also the 1935 welcome of Mussolini to MacDonald (fully reciprocated) at Stresa.

His Late Majesty King George V. shaking hands with Signor Mussolini in his first year of office. Marconi and the world watched the event.

The King picture was circulated as a postcard by Sir Harry Brittain's movement. We reproduce the wording on the "writing" side of the card. Sir Harry Brittain's "biography" and list of honours occupies a considerable space in "Who's Who." One of the largest biographies in the volume. This Pro-Mussolinite suffered no discomfort from his association and in due course veered to Anti-Fascism. Some of the folk who innocently kept the postcard were interned under 18B.

All of which is food for thought.

NOTES AND COMMENTS
BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Peace News contains some very apt comments on the Polish situation and the failure of victory to secure British war aims. "Britain went to war professedly to defend Poland. Britain is victorious, yet Poland has lost everything, not only huge tracts of territory, but the barest semblence of real independence. Never has a faithful ally of this country been so completely and so brazenly let down as Poland has been by Mr. Churchill's Government. That is in itself an extraordinary consequence of British victory, but it leads to another. The Polish settlement has been approved by an overwhelming majority of Parliament. That is equally extraordinary and the reason why Parliament has done this is that the sacrifice of Poland has been represented as the necessary price on which Russia has insisted of Russia's remaining our ally and consenting to sponsor a world-peace organisation. At this point the paradox becomes fantastic. The price of Russia entering a world peace organisation is that she should be allowed to deal with Poland precisely as she would have done if no world-peace organisation had existed." Truly the inexorable march of events is doing all that one could wish to show up the egregious folly of our war-mongering politicians and the complete futility of their unnecessary war. The tragedy is that so many thonsands of innocent people must pay so heavy a price as their unwilling contribution to this demonstration of our leaders' folly.

Commander Stephen King-Hall's pamphlet "Russia To-day and To-morrow," published by the National Newsletter, 162 Buckingham Palace Road, London, S.W.1., makes exceedingly interesting reading as it contains the impressions gained on a very recent visit by a Member of Parliament who is considerably above the average, both in intelligence and in capacity for fair judgement. Although Commander King-Hall who, with other Members of Parliament, had a personal interview with Stalin, wisely writes of Russia and her rulers with courtesy and an obvious desire for the development of friendly relations between the Soviet and Great Britain, he dispels a considerable number of illusions for any reader who is capable of being shifted out of a fool's paradise by something less forcible than a charge of dynamite. "Many people," he writes, "suppose that Russians are Communists, or Bolsheviks with knives in their mouths whose only desire it is to overthrow Capitalist Governments and Capitalist forms of society and so set up an idealistic and classless society in which the motto shall be 'From each according to his means, to each according to his needs.' Other people suppose that this classless ideal society has been achieved, or nearly achieved, and that Soviet Russia is a Paradise on earth from which the less noble features of free Capitalist society have vanished. Both these conceptions of Russia are entirely and completely wrong. . . . True Communism, as expressed by the activities of the Third International is not only dead and buried in Russia. It has been exhumed and kicked round the streets. It is called 'Trotskyism' and is anathema. The only political party permitted to exist is called the Communist Party. Its numbers are limited and include all the principal personalities in Russian life. . . . The present Communist Party in Russia, of which Marshal Stalin is the Secretary-General, should be called 'The Russian Nationalist Party' or 'The All-Russian Patriotic Party.' . . . Russia is not a classless society. The Russians don't pretend that it is classless. . . . The special classes in Russia to-day can be broadly catalogued as follows: officers of the armed forces (there are about ten thousand generals I am told); bureaucrats and officials, of whom there are many; technical men and women; heads of factories, etc.; artists, writers, composers and singers; professors and teachers; rich peasants and rich workers; officials of the Communist Party. . . . I prophesy with complete confidence that to the list mentioned above it will soon be necessary to add ecclesiastical dignitaries of the Orthodox Church. . . . When organised religion in Russia was hostile to the régime the so-called 'Communist Party' destroyed its enemy, but in this war—always referred to by the Russians as the Patriotic War—the Orthodox Church has supported the war-effort. It has, within the limits of its powers, subscribed to War Loans. Its leaders have preached patriotic sermons. . . . Therefore the Orthodox Church in Russia is now a supporter of the régime and upon its emaciated body the rays of the Kremlin sun are now beginning to fall."

Commander King-Hall describes how he went into a kindergarten at a University and found twenty-five small children singing a song, the theme of which was "We must hate the Germans." In an adjacent room children of five and six years old were being taught patriotic songs and were well supplied with miniature rifles, toy tanks and other weapons of war.

Commander King-Hall is, unfortunately, not optimistic about the possibility of friendly contact between the British and American peoples and the peoples of Russia. He does not think there would be any opposition to such contacts on the part of the British or American Governments, but he asks "Will the rulers of Russia welcome these contacts? I shall be most agreeably surprised if, during the next decade, we make much progress in the task of really getting to know the Russian people. In order that this should come about, there would have to be a very extraordinary change in the Russian official line. . . . It is impossible for any foreign person resident in Moscow to get to know Russians 'en famille.' It is notoriously dangerous for any Russian to become too friendly with a foreigner. I shall be astonished if the heavy and cumbersome censorship, centralised in Moscow, is relaxed when the shooting stops."

Christian people will find Commander King-Hall's account of the position of the Russian Church disappointing, though not surprising. The increased toleration of religion, of which we have heard so much, appears to have been purchased by the Orthodox Church imitating the Church of England in exchanging the worship of Christ for the worship of Mars. A Church which so betrays its Master cannot lead any really great and lasting spiritual revival.

The enlightened Americal paper Commonsense, speaking of the reaction in Russia from idealism to militarism and saying that progressive Americans can no more defend the expanding nationalism of Stalin's Russia than they can defend the defensive imperialism of Churchill's Britain, concludes with these wise words: "Opposition to Stalin's rule is no more anti-Russian than opposition to Churchill's rule is anti-British. In any case, no one suggests that we make Russia a democracy by going to war with her, any more than we oppose British imperialism by fighting Britain. On those things which are in the common interest of the peoples of the world we can co-operate with Russia and with Britain. Perhaps the best service we can render democracy in Russia and in the world is to furnish a better example of it than we have heretofore done."

Reality comments on the peculiar way in which individual M.P.s in the House of Commons protest against some evil for which the Government is responsible, but neither support one another, nor, when it comes to voting, oppose the Government, "all of which is evidence that there is something very much wrong with the Party Whip (Treasury-controlled) system. The protests are mere lip-protests. The Treasury has already bought their votes, so that under the cloak of Democracy something quite different has perverted the function of representation."

The different political parties are now busy getting out their programmes in preparation for the coming Election. The Labour Party propose the nationalisation of the Bank of England and some control over the other banks. Not a word however, about any alteration in the method of creating and issuing money, which is the only thing that really matters. Financiers know well, especially after the experience they had with the Labour Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Snowden, that they have nothing whatever to fear from nationalisation of the banks as long as the money game is played according to the old orthodox rules. In fact they rather welcome the increased facilities provided for centralising their power.

The Conservatives say they are all out for doing away with war-time controls and restoring freedom and enterprise. Not a word, however, about the removal of the worst control and tyranny of all—that of Finance!

The Liberals have a really splendid programme with which it is difficult to find fault except in regard to one or two minor details. Unfortunately however, they, too, make no mention of the reform of the financial system without which 80 per cent. of their excellent programme must remain unrealisable. In fairness to them, however, it is only right to add that they are allowing at least one of their candidates to include monetary reform in his programme.

On April 2nd the Times referred to Malta's "sound financial position" and in the same issue stated that certain taxes are being increased substantially. The "sounder" the finance, the heavier the taxation, and the greater the restriction of the satisfaction of human need!

When the Philippines were threatened in 1941, President Roosevelt promised that he would give them independence. Now that they are more or less out of danger from Japan, Paul McNutt, U.S. Manpower Commissioner, says "If the Filipinos defer the question of independence, they are more likely to get a sympathetic reaction from Congress on rehabilitation measures." In other words, they are being asked to sacrifice the independence that was once promised them for the sake of economic help from American Big Business and Big Finance!

Fred Rodell writes in The Progressive, "The United Nations' set-up for peace would last precisely as long as peace between the Big Three or the Big Four or the Big Five would last without any United Nations set up, and, while it lasted, it would simply mean that the world would be run by the mighty, and peace—sweet peace—would be a one-sided peace, imposed by the powerful in their own selfish and still national interests."

The same paper, dealing with the fear expressed by some that ex-Servicemen after their return will show a predilection for crime, says "Our guarantee that our veterans won't practise their newly-acquired skills (in killing) when they get back home . . . is to worry less about what crimes they might commit against society, and pay more attention to the crimes society may commit against them."

I commented not very long ago on the unexpectedly small percentage—about 20 per cent. —of Britain's pre-war business which was represented by the import-export trade. I read recently that during the past fifty years the United States had not exported more than six or seven per cent of their total production—though of course even six or seven per cent. of so large a total production, amounted to a substantial figure.

Socialists who live in towns or in the drier portions of the British Isles, are apt to have wonderful visions of a restoration of the crofter population of the Highlands and of the Western Scottish Isles. My view that this plan is largely impracticable and undesirable, has been considerably strengthened by a well-written book, "I WENT A'SHEP-HERDING," by Richard Perry. Mr. Perry, who has worked for some years on a sheep farm in Skye, handles his subject with knowledge and sympathy, whether he is dealing with men or animals. He makes it very plain, however, that the district of which he writes is but a poor proposition from an economic standpoint. The soil is poor—very poor—but by far the worst obstacle and one which can hardly be overcome by any kind of human ingenuity, is the weather. You cannot harvest satisfactory crops when there are late and severe frosts in May, and when torrential rains frequently begin at the end of June or in early July and, in many seasons, continue almost without a break until the autumn.

The breed of cattle best able to stand up to these severe conditions—the old Black Cattle—is now totally extinct, and the modern West Highlander, which alone approaches them in hardiness, is a poor milker and very slow in reaching maturity. Black-faced sheep, the main standby of present-day agriculture in those districts, have wool of poor quality for which the market has of recent years largely disappeared, and though their mutton is excellent, the carcases are small and often do not fetch a very satisfactory price. Hardy as the animals are, the death-rate is exceedingly heavy from starvation, accidents, disease and parasites, among the worst of the latter being the dreaded greenbottle fly which deposits living maggots on sheep's back, with the result that the unfortunate animal is eaten alive. Some of the troubles in which the sheep become involved would be less serious if they did not have to range over so wide an area and if more shepherds could be employed, but if more men were employed, the wage-bill, which in this industry is the most important item, is increased, and the already meagre and uncertain profits are reduced. Another serious trouble is due to the great increase and spread of bracken which it is somewhat costly and difficult to check and which has the double disadvantage of curtailing the available pasture and affording a favourite cover for flies.

In dealing with the people of the district, Mr. Perry writes appreciatively of their good qualities of hospitality and endurance, but he also refers to their faults and handicaps, some of which are induced by the climatic conditions themselves. The men are apt to show a lack of timely enterprise, putting off until to-morrow jobs which urgently need doing to-day and they are also apt to treat their animals harshly, especially their dogs. The conditions under which the women are forced to exist are unhealthy and laborious, and the religion of the people still shows to an extreme degree that narrow and puritanical fundamentalism which has made the Scottish Sabbath notorious and which often seems to derive its inspiration from the less admirable portions of the Old Testament, rather than from the understanding, practical humanity of Jesus Christ.

In a brief but able speech, delivered in the House of Commons on April 11th, Mr. Rhys Davies made a vigorous protest against the proposed use of conscript German labour in Russia and other countries. He pointed out that in no country are the people to any important degree responsible for their leaders' wars, and, as he had always opposed the use of foreign conscript labour by the German Government, so also he was opposed to the use of conscript German labour by the victorious Allies. This is sound logic, sound Socialism and sound humanity.

At a time when the imitation by Russia and by most of the new governments of the "liberated" countries of the barbarities which propaganda associates with Fascism, has been causing growing concern; and at a time when even the war correspondents of our daily Press have been showing signs of apprehension at the appalling results of the total destruction of German cities by allied air attacks; the discovery of a concentration camp, complete with atrocities and capable of being visited by British M.P.s has come as a veritable godsend to our Vansittartists.

Sensible people will of course remember that just as one swallow does not make a summer, so one brutal official does not condemn a whole race. When we read recently of an English farmer who starved and beat a boy until he died we did not at once conclude that all English farmers behaved in a similar way, nor did we hold the entire British nation, nor even Mr. Hudson and the Board of Agriculture, personally responsible.

Among concentration camps Dachau has had a sinister reputation, yet a Czech Jew who had the misfortune to be interned there and later was imprisoned under regulation 18B when he sought refuge in Britain, told a friend of mine that he preferred the Continental penitentiary. Some time later a first-hand report from an entirely trustworthy observer showed me why. Dachau, it appears, had both good and bad features. The commandant was a bullying type and the occupants of the dark punishment cells looked pale and scared (as no doubt did the inmates of our Latchmere House, Ham Common), but the ordinary prisoners, Jews included, appeared remarkably healthy and the food was excellent. Natually if the Czech Jew had managed to keep out of the punishment cells he would have found the association and good food of Dachau preferable to the solitary confinement and miserable diet of an English prison.

A Vansittartist on the warpath about Buchenwald might be invited to consider how he would react if he found himself in charge of a camp containing Germans, pro-Germans and conscientious objectors. Would he be very particular about food and kind treatment at a time when the German forces had invaded England successfully; laid her principal cities in the South in ruins; killed, perhaps, some of his relations; disorganised all transport; and rendered desperate the plight of the British army who were fighting on because they preferred death to the slavery the German leaders were promising them?

I have no objection to the trial of war criminals, whether they be German or of any other nationality, provided that the proceedings are fair and that a full and accurate account is published. Most certainly they ought to be tried. But what chance is there of a fair trial and an accurate report if the arrangements are made by governments who have shown themselves so singularly destitute of any knowledge of the elementary principles of just judgment and so adept at concealing their own share of responsibility for evil deeds and grave tragedies?

In this connection a friend writes, "I have seen similar ghastly photographs of the piles of dead and of dying victims of Churchill's refusal to grant the U.S.A. famine-relief ships, navicerts (for Greece). Also I have in my possession a record and evidence, filed at Geneva, of tortures inflicted on the Arabs by British-controlled officials, which, for fiendish and sadistic obscenity, surpass anything so far proved in the Buchenwald camp."

My friend's story of Palestine atrocities I have had confirmed from various sources. In one case, in order to compel him to reveal the whereabouts of his comrades, police tied a cord round the top of an Arab rebel's head and, as he would not speak, finally tore his scalp right off. Not the least ugly aspect of Palestine atrocities was the imprisonment, under 18B, of an English official who had protested more vigorously than those in authority apparently deemed to be desirable. A minority of most nations commit atrocities and the lesson of the mote and the beam is ever apt to be forgotten.

The Peoples' Common Law Parliament have been seeking with, I understand, some measure of success, the support of the Governments to be represented at the San Francisco Conference for a Petition drawing attention to some of the objectives for which the P.C.L.P. has been working. These include the creation of money as a public service and as a means of exchange and not as an instrument for profit or speculation by the money-creators; the taking of referendums among the peoples of different nations before legislation on matters of major importance, such as health and education, is enacted and before there is a declaration of war. It is further emphasised that human life shall not be treated as subservient to monetary policy or industrial exploitation; that no persons shall suffer poverty or insecurity while there are resources, actual or potential, available to meet their needs; that adequate purchasing power shall be provided and trade barriers removed; and that all peoples shall have representation at an International Court of Justice. Further information with regard to this and other activities of P.C.L.P. can be obtained from their headquarters at 5 Endsleigh Place, London W.C.1.

General Smuts is reported to have said recently that war must be prevented even at the cost of war. I have long considered General Smuts to be one of those public figures whose wisdom is much over-rated and this profound remark confirms me in my opinion.

During the closing days of the war detailed arrangements were made with the Germans to allow us to take food to the people of Holland. At certain specified hours British ships, planes and lorries carrying food were permitted to enter without molestation or injury.

So although you can't possibly negotiate with the Germans because you can't trust them, where there's a will there's a way—as I said all along!

Rhona Churchill, the imaginative war correspondent of the Daily Mail, tells, in the issue of April 24, a most moving atrocity story. A German in charge of political prisoners decided that the time had come for them to be liquidated, so he marched them to a lonely field where a great hay barn was standing. "Fetch petrol from the nearest dump," he told his men. Then "he set his weary prisoners to the gruesome task of digging their own graves." When the petrol arrived and had been poured on the hay he ordered the prisoners into the barn and "personally flung the match which lighted the human bonfire." Why, then, the graves? No, Rhona Churchill should be more careful. The story of the Germans who donned football kit for a match in which Jewish babies were used as footballs has much more "finish"!

The assassination of Mussolini and the death of Hitler remove from the stage of international politics two figures with whom I prophesy that future historians will deal more leniently than present-day war propagandists.

Winston Churchill the writer who, strange to say, was much less of a fool than Winston Churchill the politician, once referred to both of them in terms of high praise. There is not the slightest reason to believe that the character of the dictators at the time of their death was materially different from what it was at the time when Mr. Churchill eulogised them. Both men did great things to promote the material well-being of their countries; gave economic security to the working classes; and improved the social services and the efficiency of agriculture and industry. Both challenged the rules of orthodox finance; rejected the philosophy of the gold standard; and freed industry and the State from servitude to the money-lender. On the other hand both—and Hitler especially—were ruthless and cruel in their persecution of their political opponents and of all whom they considered their countries' enemies. In this respect, however, they were no worse than Stalin, and Regulation 18B is a standing memorial to the fact that a smear of tar from the same brush has marked our own British politicians. Both dictators were guilty of the evil folly of condemning, wholesale, large groups and classes of people —Jews especially—of very varied character.

Their mentality, however, finds its exact counterpart in this country in Lord Vansittart and in the thousands of other persons who condemn utterly all Germans, Jews or conscientious objectors.

Both dictators glorified war, but so apparently does Stalin, judging by the present highly militarist set-up in Russia, and so do the extreme militarists in Britain and America.

Both believed in the hellish method of war as an instrument of international policy and a means of securing the redress of grievances and, as a result, they have brought destruction upon their countries. On the other hand all non-pacifists on the Allied side also believe in war as a means of securing the redress of grievances and it is only fair to the dictators to remember that if they had not resorted to arms there is every reason to believe that the financiers and politicians of the democracies would have prevented them from achieving certain perfectly legitimate aims which, in their impatience, they sought to achieve by violence. It may also be argued, with justice, that Hitler, a soldier in the last war, should have had sufficient realization of what war is, and means, to deter him from going to war, even on the undoubtedly provocative Polish issue; yet on the other hand it may be that it is to his personal experience of war-suffering that we at least owe the blessing of deliverance in the present struggle, from the final atrocity of the use of gas.

Both dictators showed scant regard for the rights of small nations, but here again their conduct is no worse than that of our Russian ally; nor have the British and American governments an entirely clean record.

To sum up, the vices of the dictators supplied the propaganda needed by their enemies to win the measure of popular support which was required to secure their overthrow; yet, by a grim irony, it was their virtues which really decided their downfall. They openly challenged the most powerful and most vicious of all tyrannies, that of Finance, which decrees that, even though labour and materials are available, production shall be hindered through lack of money. If their brutality and aggression had been their real crime, why are these faults ignored when displayed by a government which, if not orthodox in its economies, will at least play ball with Wall Street and the City by exporting gold?

After nearly six years of slaughter and destruction on a scale unparalleled in history, an end has at last come in Europe to the most unnecessary and senseless war in modern history. Nothing—less than nothing—of the slightest moral or genuine political value has been gained by it. To-day in Europe there is, at the end, more ruthless totalitarian tyranny and political persecution than there was at the beginning and even countries once moderately democratic have been deeply affected by the general poison. Poland, the original cause of the dispute, is without real freedom and is to be deprived of more territory than Hitler ever asked for. Other small nations have been seized by aggression and their rights ignored. Pledges have been broken. If the "balance of power" be considered a desirable condition, never was there a more complete un-balance. There is a gigantic increase in the spirit of militarism and nationalism, especially in the chief victor—Russia. Famine, disease and economic chaos have been spread over wide areas of Europe, not by reason of Axis policy, but by reason of the allied policy of unconditional surrender. Orthodox Finance will be re-established in those countries from which it was temporarily expelled and, in due course, will produce, as of old, poverty in the midst of potential plenty. Crime and vice have increased enormously. The prospects of anything resembling a just and durable peace are of the very worst; the prospects of a third war, on the contrary, excellent. In their effort to secure a fair and durable peace by negotiation, pacifists have once more been defeated by the blind obstinacy of political leaders; the powerful weapon of propaganda; and the stupidity of the mass of the people; yet the soundness of their case against war in general and this war in particular has been vindicated up to the very hilt. Every fundamental moral and economic problem that existed at the beginning of the war still remains completely unsolved and, what is more, will have to be tackled under infinitely more difficult conditions. Total victory in total war has ended in total failure to get anywhere or achieve anything—exactly as we foretold!

QUESTIONS CONCERNING MONEY.

Dear Aldred,—At the moment of writing I have not been able to identify the particular monetary reform paper from which I took the figures criticised by Mr. Craig, and get in touch with the Editor.

I can, however, answer his main queries. The reasons why a country's factories can, during a given period, produce goods to a far greater value than the total of the wages, salaries and dividends they distribute, are as follows. When there is increasing mechanisation—and increasing mechanisation is a marked characteristic of modern industry—during any given period more money is being collected, through prices, and put into depreciation funds for prospective renewals of worn-out plant, etc., than is being paid out of such funds for current renewals. This means that a portion of the money from sales which would otherwise have been distributed as profits is kept back and put into a depreciation fund from which no equivalent sum emerges as wage-payments during the period under review. If no palliative measures were adopted the difference between the sum paid out WOULD represent, in Mr. Craig's words, "a dead loss to the community," or, if the producers decided to give away the goods they could not sell, anyhow a dead loss to the producers.

Investment is another very important reason why, during a given period, the total price of the goods produced may far exceed the total of wages, salary and dividend payments.

Money which otherwise would have been distributed as dividends is invested either in the extension of existing businesses or in the setting up of new ones, and as soon as the extensions or new businesses get going they put on to the market additional goods in respect of which no additional money has necessarily been created or can be distributed in the form of wages, salaries, or dividends. Some Social Credit experts are of opinion that other non-wage items besides depreciation charges, which enter into costs and prices—payments for raw materials, machinery, etc.—do not, under modern conditions, "turn into" wage, salary and dividend payments, FAST ENOUGH during any given period, to play their due part in clearing from the market all the goods that need to be sold during that same period. This is a highly technical and controversial issue involving consideration of "rates of flow" upon which, quite frankly, I do not feel myself competent, at the moment, to express a considered judgment; but increasing mechanisation and investment, as causes of disparity between available purchasing power and prices, are unassailable.

Mr. Craig asks what steps were taken to see that production and income figures were comparable. The answer is "No adequate and sensible ones," but the following were among the probable palliatives to avert too disastrous a breakdown and enforced reform of the money system:—

1. The creation, by banks, of more money for loans, overdrafts and the purchase of securities than, during the years under review, they destroyed by receiving repayment of loans and overdrafts and by the sale of securities.

2. A "favourable" (save the mark!) trade balance may have been built up. Some of the goods may have been exported to foreign countries in exchange for debt, i.e., since no equivalent value of imports was taken as an exchange, the foreign countries increased that debt to the country obtaining the "favourable" trade balance.

3. New money may have been created by bank loan to finance Public Works. New money may have been created by bank loan to pay men in the Fighting Services and to produce armaments which very likely are not included in this total of "goods produced by the factories" as they would not be placed on the ordinary consumer market for sale.

Yours faithfully,

BEDFORD.

LEIGH HUNT'S "DUNGEON"

[We select this passage from Leigh Hunt's "autobiography." Contrast his prison treatment against that of conscientious objectors, who ought to be deemed State or political prisoners, and other admittedly political offenders to-day, under universal suffrage, and "Labour" Secretaries of State.—Ed.]

The doctor then proposed that I should be removed to the prison infirmary; and this proposal was granted. Infirmary had, I confess, an awkward sound, even to my ears. I fancied a room shared with other sick persons, not the best suited for companions; but the good-natured doctor (his name was Dixon) undeceived me. The infirmary was divided into four wards, with so many small rooms attached to them. The two upper wards were occupied, but the two on the floor had never been used; and one of these, not very providently (for I had not yet learned to think of money) I turned into a noble room. I papered the walls with a trellis of roses: I had the ceiling coloured with clouds and sky; the barred windows I screened with Venetian blinds; and when my book-cases were set up with their busts, and flowers, and a pianoforte made their appearance, perhaps there was not a handsomer room on that side the water. I took a pleasure, when a stranger knocked at the door, to see him come in and stare about him. The surprise on issuing from the Borough, and passing through the avenues of a gaol was dramatic. Charles Lamb declared there was no other such room, except in a fairy tale.

But I possessed another surprise; which was a garden. There was a little yard outside the room, railed off from another belonging to a neighbouring ward. This yard I shut in with green palings, adorned it with a trellis, bordered it with a thick bed of earth from a nursery, and even contrived to have a grass-plot. The earth I filled with flowers and young trees. There was an apple-tree, from which we managed to get a pudding the second year. As to my flowers, they were allowed to be perfect. Thomas Moore, who came to see me with Lord Byron, told me he had seen no such heart's-ease. I bought the Parnaso-Italiano while in prison, and used often to think of a passage in it, while looking at this miniature piece of horticulture:—

My little garden,
To me thou art vineyard, field and meadow, and wood.

Here I wrote and read in fine weather, sometimes under an awning. In autumn, my trellises were hung with scarlet-runners, which added to the flowery investment. I used to shut my eyes in my arm-chair, and affect to think myself hundreds of miles off.

But my triumph was in issuing forth of a morning. A wicket gate out of the garden led into the large one belonging to the prison. The latter was only for vegetables; but it contained a cherry tree, which I saw twice in blossom. I parcelled out the ground in my imagination into favourite districts. I made a point of dressing myself as if for a long walk; and then, putting on my gloves, and taking my book under my arm, stepped forth, requesting my wife not to wait dinner if I was too late. My eldest little boy, to whom Lamb addressed some charming verses on the occasion, was my constant companion, and we used to play all sorts of juvenile games together. It was, probably, in dreaming of one of these games (but the words had a more touching effect on my ear) that he exclaimed one night in his sleep, "No; I'm not lost; I'm found." Neither he nor I were very strong at that time; but I have lived to see him a man of eight and forty; and wherever he is found, a generous hand and a great understanding will be found together.

BATTLING SURGEON

By

Dr. Charles W. Brook

It may seem rather unusual for an author to review his own work, but The Word is an unusual journal and Battling Surgeon is frankly intended to be an unusual book.

It is primarily an introduction to the life of a most vigorous personality—Thomas Wakley, who was born 150 years ago next July. Although now only known to a very few, Wakley was, in my view, by far the most important member of the British medical profession during the last century. Those who dislike the medical profession collectively will probably arrive at the conclusion that in the long run Wakley, as a medical reformer, was a very mixed blessing, for although he attacked the small ring of the hierarchy of his profession ("a gang of hospital surgeons," he called them) he did not break the ring but enlarged and substantially strengthened it. Wakley in fact created the medical profession which we know to-day and made it so powerful that it can, through its British Medical Association defy the Government and apparently get away with it.

Like Richard Carlile who was seven years his senior, Thomas Wakley was a Devon man. But unlike Carlile, he had a well to-do father who was able to have him trained as a surgeon, but had insufficient foresight to have him apprenticed at a high premium to one of the small clique of leading London surgeons who were led by Sir Astley Cooper and John Abernethy. Consequently Wakley after qualifying found that he was condemned to become a humble rank-and-filer, and this did not suit him at all. The opportunity to declare war on Cooper, Abernethy & Co. came about through a very strange incident, in which, personally, I think, the crafty William Cobbett had a hand. I hope that I have been sufficiently impartial in my narrative to allow readers to judge for themselves.

I can now relate a personal anecdote.

When I was in hospital recovering from an operation and planning this work as a relaxation, the Night Sister found me at 2 o'clock one morning comfortably propped up in bed and very much awake. "What are you doing with your light on at this unearthly hour?" she asked, very severely. "Well the fact is, Sister, I am trying to make up my mind whether a certain man was a 'Fire Bug.'" After a momentary look of horror she quietly, but very firmly, commented: "If I were you I should turn off your light and go to sleep." I did as I was told but with my mind not made up!

Whether my suspicions were well-founded or not, the incident was the turning point of Wakley's career, for with the insurance money he collected and with the active help of William Cobbett and two disgruntled surgeons, he launched his still living memorial, "The Lancet."

This was a strange little journal in those days but very typical of the vigorous Radical journalism which Richard Carlile was successfully championing from his cell in Dorchester Gaol. It was little short of a miracle that it ever survived its birth pangs, for its editor was soon in the Courts in a series of conflicts with the surgical hierarchy and editors of rival journals, culminating in a sensational libel action, which Wakley brilliantly defended in person, arising from a "Lancet" report which I have republished in full, of a most barbarous operation performed by Sir Astley Cooper's nephew at Guy's Hospital, with an implied accusation of manslaughter against the operator. The result of this case and Wakley's forcible ejection from the lecture theatre of the Royal College of Surgeons in London made him the undisputed leader of the medical reform movement, culminating in 1858 with the establishment of the Medical Register and the General Medical Council.

But it is not as the most important Medical Reformer that Wakley deserves to be remembered, for he was, perhaps, the greatest Radical Humanist of his time. Elected to Parliament as Independent M.P. for Finsbury, at no expense to himself, he made possibly the most impassioned speech ever heard in the House of Commons on behalf of the transported Tolpuddle Martyrs, and if there was any political persecution he was always chosen as the parliamentary spokesman of protest.

In the House of Commons he again and again vainly agitated against the flogging to death of soldiers, but it was as Coroner for West Middlesex that he abruptly put a stop to the foul practice. The story of the killing of Private White is full of drama; "Coroner Wakley seemed like a man compromised to infamy or worse. . . ." commented the editor of a rival medical journal, but Coroner Wakley got the verdict he wanted.

His continuous protests against the shocking cruelties perpetrated through the Poor Law Amendment Act fell on deaf ears in the House of Commons, but it was the statistics published in "The Lancet" exposing all the horrors of the concentration camps of those days which temporarily aroused the public conscience. Wakley was a great journalist, and his brilliant and ruthless exposure of the appalling adulteration of foodstuffs resulted in our existing Food and Drug Laws.

I have not glossed over his failings. Like Robert Taylor, "The Devil's Chaplain," he could exploit dramatic situations to his own advantage, and like Disraeli, he was foppish in his dress. He was shockingly intolerant to anybody whom he regarded as holding unorthodox medical opinions, and while there may have been some justification for his ruthless exposure of John St. John Long, the fashionable Harley Street charlatan, his treatment of the unorthodox Dr. John Elliotson, the most scientific physician of the period, was brutal and inexcusable.

Nevertheless, I claim that I have proved my contention that Thomas Wakley was the most important figure in the nineteenth century British medical profession, and it is not inappropriate that the Foreword has been written by my friend, Dr. Somerville Hastings, President of the Socialist Medical Association and leader of the present British Medical Reform movement.

The biography is unorthodox but, I hope, not too bewildering to the reader, for I have provided a running commentary, and discuss, among many other things, the rise of the medical profession which we know to-day, the immense power still possessed by the Medical Corporations, the composition and functions of the General Medical Council, the deficiencies of our present Food and Drug Acts, and have given even a gentle smack at Bernard Shaw.

There may be some factual errors in the book but, so far, I have discovered only one. I am now doubtful if Francis Place ever accepted hospitality from Wakley, for it was not Place's habit to accept hospitality from anyone. I am also, now, of the opinion that Place's influence over Wakley did not last very long, for it is likely that they were in violent conflict over the Poor Law Amendment Act, of which Place was a leading supporter and of which Wakley was the principal critic. Wakley, I have since found, allied himself with the revolutionary "Rotundanists" in their struggle against the reformists led by Place. Some time I want to delve into Place's voluminous manuscripts at the British Museum, for I am certain I shall find a good deal of hitherto undisclosed information about Wakley.

Guy Aldred has my special gratitude for tackling a job at which orthodox publishers would frown, but it is, for my own part, a further trifling contribution to what Aldred has rightly named "The Carlile Period," and it has also given me the opportunity of getting a few of my own views into print. Of one thing I am certain, and that is, that the present medical hierarchy won't like "Battling Surgeon" one little bit. But that doesn't worry me.

Seven Men Who Won't Obey

(A poet's reading of the N.Z. Herald report, 6/9/44).

* * Comrade Hansen has sent us a number of poems. All of these will appear in these columns. They tell the story of the Anti-Military or Anti-War struggle in New Zealand.—Ed.

They came before the Magistrate,
Those seven "striking" men,
And each, in turn, was asked to state
His "reasons" there and then.

This, Harold Hansen did achieve—
Which stirred official wrath:
At Strathmore Camp he would not leave
His hut, when ordered forth.

Then he, so peaceful and polite,
Who would not harm a sparrow,
Was handcuffed lest he try to fight—
And shifted in a barrow!

He told the Court that MEN could not Submissively accept
Conditions that the Camps begot,
Nor meekly there be kept.

He also to the Court declared
An unchanged attitude—
For he, at length, had fully dared
And would not be subdued.

John Hamerton recorded well
How he three months remained Alone within a compound cell—
Plus three long years detained.

Despite cruel cold and scanty food
This Stalwart held his ground;
From Christian Conscience, this accrued—
He would not "twist around."

Compliant he would never be
In pagan servitude:
God's truth for him meant Honesty—
No fleeting, fickle mood!

Roland Hall outspokenly
Declared the camps a blot
Upon New Zealand's history!
This made His Honour hot:

Retorted he (or nearly so):
"Your lot's a just requitement!
"The view of all the folk I know
"Reverses your indictment."

McAlpine to His Honour stressed
A Five-months-made decision:
He'd not obey, however pressed—
Stood true to inner vision.

Of Townend it was certified
That three months' prison still
Had failed to "penetrate his hide"—
Had failed to change his will.

The clothes he wore he'd not remove,
Nor dress by regulation,
And thus, by "forcing" force, did prove
A bother and vexation.

The Magistrate was not impressed
With what he dubbed "opinions"
The Law alone must be assessed—
And so we mould our minions!

Hugh Kelly, also Allan Yates
Were heard, but not reported.
Alas our hardened magistrates!!—
Men's lives so sadly thwarted!

For Hansen got three months in "clink";
The others got "duration";
But they have played their part, I think,
To rouse this fallen nation.

REACTIONS TO WAR: A STUDY

By JOHN JENNINGS

[This essay was addressed to us in the form of a letter but it merits publication as an essay.—Ed.]

I am writing this believing that many people have thought and are thinking along similar lines, and that to express these ideas will help to formulate a definitely stated philosophy, a sort of common denominator of our ideas. At anyrate, it can contribute to the establishment of a bond of sympathy.

Obviously, the basic policies that motivate this letter are not original: they are inspired by writings by yourself, by the Duke of Bedford, by many other contributions to modern thought; I have merely tried to apply a synthesis, which may evoke the agreement of some and the disagreement of others. All the better; criticism is always an essential element in construction.

My own experience in regard to this war must be similar to that of thousands. I started out hating Fascism in so far as it is the political expression of Big Capitalism. It destroyed all opposition by violence, glorified war, and prepared for war. It supported reactionary movements, such as the Franco rebellion in Spain; and, in turn, reactionary movements in other countries supported Fascism and Nazism. The Chamberlain policy of "appeasement" served the Fascist-Nazi policies well. Munich cleared one great geographical and fortification barrier out of the way of the apparent direction of the coming Nazi thrust. The way was nearly clear for the Fascist-Nazi domination of Europe. It seemed as though the grand plan was for Soviet Russia (which many regarded as the place where, for the first time in history, Socialism was being "built-up") to be either conquered by Fascism or vitiated by a prolonged military struggle, which would leave the "Western Democracies"—Britain, America, and France—top-dogs in a devastated, potentially subservient world. But Soviet Russia threw a spanner into the works by signing a non-aggression pact with Hitlerite Germany at the crucial moment. Hitler reversed the schedule by attacking his commercial-financial enemies first, instead of concentrating his early strength against what many of us regarded as his prime political enemy, Russia, key-centre of the Third International. What precisely happened afterwards is clouded by the mists of censorship. All we know is that Hess came over here—perhaps with second-thought proposals that Britain and the U.S.A. should stand on one side while Germany, etc., waded into the Soviet Union. What reply, if any, Hess was able to get back to Berlin, we don't know; but it seems tolerably certain that Hitler felt sure that if he attacked Russia the Allies would not interfere. Whatever happened—deception or crass misjudgment—we don't know; but the results are obvious.

Now, to return to the matter of personal reaction. At the start of the war, I and those who thought the same way were too incensed over such matters as Hitler's intervention in Spain, his occupation of Czecho-Slovakia, and the "appeasement" of him by the British Tories, to regard Russia's eleventh-hour defection as anything but justifiable expediency, or the "Democracies" going to war as anything but necessary and long-overdue opposition to Fascism. We ignored the obvious self-interest of our finance capitalists and commercial interests. I was therefore one of the millions who, though hating war, chauvinism, and militarism, raised no objection to going into the Forces. I was invalided out about two years later, and subsequently pensioned on the grounds that my disseminated sclerosis was aggravated by military service.

Since then, much has happened to modify my opinions, and to bring me into sympathy with the philosophy expressed in The Word. First, there has been a growing loss of faith in the "building-up" of Socialism in the Soviet Union. I know, of course, that this cannot be done in the throes of total war; but Russia is busy developing a nationalistic, chauvinist philosophy, and her military and other policies seem to be in line, not with the aspirations of international Socialism, but with a policy of national aggrandisement and neo-imperialism based on State Capitalism. Either there is a superb control and propagandic editing of information regarding Russia, or Russia is going down hill. Secondly, there is a growing realisation that if there is no Socialism or promise of Socialism in Russia to defend, this war is, for the ordinary peoples, just a cruel, senseless orgy of slaughter between contending Capitalist interests.

Thirdly, there is the point, very effectively emphasised by the Duke of Bedford, that finance is the mainspring of every modern capitalist system. From the facts which he advances, I prefer to conclude that a monetary system based on the real wealth of domestic production plus imports offers the best economic method for the transition to the perfect social system—Communist anarchy. For it will be, I fear, a long process before the majority of the British people are converted to a knowledge of, and belief in, Communist anarchism. We must have commonsense now while we are waiting for full sanity. A reformed monetary system would offer the means of educating people for fundamental social-economic change; and to establish full national control of Finance would be a really revolutionary step.

A "reformed" money system, based upon goods and services instead of upon gold and the edicts of the financiers, must of course include in the computation of the resources which will give it value, and to which it will itself be the title, the great volume of imported goods, food, raw materials, etc., which form so large a part of the national wealth and of the requirements of both consumers and producers. This may complicate the foundation and operation of the new system, but it is far from being a real obstacle to its attainment. For the material basis of national wealth must be the whole of the resources available to the nation, whatever their origin, and is statistically computable wherever its location at the time of computation.

It is obvious from the nature of the arguments I have put forward that I regard the words "to the nation" in the last paragraph as integral. The nation must be the owner of the national wealth, not just a section of the nation; and, most vital of all, the fresh creation of an investment system, and the use of the new-based money as the motive force of a new imperialism (or the resuscitation of the old!), must be prevented. It must be remembered that although the fundamental task must be to render an (orthodox) financial system and an investment system unnecessary, the acquisitive instinct, the love of personal power, and the delight in the "sport" of gambling—on both the means of life and life itself—are strong human traits, which it will be a primary task of the new civilisation, for which some of us are striving, to eradicate.

"PANGS OF CONSCIENCE"

Beneath this striking caption, The Washington Post for Wednesday, November 22, 1944, published the following balanced and powerful editorial comment on the treatment of conscience in the United States, as shown in the case of Dr. Don Charles De Vault:

When the Army finds a man physically unfit for military service, it sends him back to civilian life with the hope that his abilities will make a contribution to the war effort. When it finds a man psychologically unfit for military service, it does the same thing. But when it finds a man conscientiously unfit—that is, unable to render military service because of conscientious scruples—it treats him in quite different fashion. It packs him off to something called a Civilian Public Service Camp and assigns him to something called "work of national importance" without taking any account whatever of his ability to render more useful service in some other sphere.

Consider the case of Don Charles DeVault by way of illustration. When this country entered the war, Dr. DeVault was engaged in teaching and research in physical chemistry at Stanford University in California. He had earned his Ph.D. at the University of California the preceding year. By order of his local Selective Service Board, he was classified II-A and given a six-month deferment on occupational grounds, although he had asked to be classified IV-E as a conscientious objector, as, on his record and his beliefs, he was. Later, he was deferred again, this time in class II-B, indicating that his work at the university was considered essential to the war effort.

The following year, however, a Government appeal agent challenged his classification, and the appeal board placed him in 1-A-O for noncombat service. He refused induction into the Army, was arrested, tried, and sentenced to 18 months in the Federal Penitentiary at McNeil Island. When he had served half this term, he was paroled, reclassified IV-E (which was what he had requested originally) and sent to the Civilian Public Service labour camp at Mancos, Colo. There from 7.30 in the morning to 5 in the afternoon he dug ditches, picked up rocks and drove trucks. But in his leisure time he teamed up with another chemist in the camp and began research into the molds from which pencillin is produced. To carry on this research work more effectively he asked for detacher service. "As I work with a shovel or lean on it and drive a truck during the 51 hours per week that I am prevented from being useful in any way comparable to what I can do or to the world situation," he wrote, "I cannot help but worry about the problem. It is not that we object to making sacrifices, because we do not. It is the uselessness of the particular sacrifices that the authorities designate us."

The sole outcome of this plea was an order transferring him to the Government camp in northern Michigan where rebellious or "non-co-operative" objectors are concentrated. There he began again his pencillin research. He gave up his furlough time to carry it on. He purchased equipment out of the $5 monthly allowance granted to him by Selective Service. When his experiments had reached what seemed to him a fruitful stage and when his parole period had expired, he appealed again for detached service. He was refused. In turn, he refused to report for the regular camp assignments. "Henceforth," he declared, "I shall be reporting for work on pencillin or related subjects." He has been arrested and is now awaiting another sentence to prison.

If there is any sense in this wasting of a man's skill, we cannot see it. If there is any justice in this punishment of a man because of his conscience, it is beyond our discernment. We say that this is stupid and ugly—and unbecoming to a great free people engaged in a war for the freedom of the human conscience.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Sir—Only through The Word do I get any news of war resistence in other parts of the world, submerged as we are under the mass of propaganda. With all good wishes.

Sincerely yours,

Ipswich. (Mrs.) ELIZABETH ROBERTS.

Sir,—Conscription for the benefit of the rich, can be extended to abolish the rich, so why rail against the method?

There is no sense in going back to "Laissez Faire" for the benefit of the capitalist.

Let the rich who have exploited conscription, hang by conscription! I refer to the conscription of their wealth and services, and not to themselves for hanging.

Let conscription secure equality of income for all, and service from all who are fit.

Why should Mr. Stronglegs have to go into the firing-line, whilst Mr. Varicose Veins is left to make a fortune as a civilian, and because of conscription?

It is not the conscription that is wrong. What is wrong is, that it is not sufficiently extensive and equually applied.

Why should hoteliers in the East Coast lose all, whilst those on the West Coast are able to sell out for fortunes and so on?

Conscription universal and equal in incidence is the cure and no nonsense.

Yours faithfully,

Paignton, 3/4/45. CHARLES E. BERRY.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have received and read with interest and enjoyment (intellectual, I hope), the April number of the "Word," and I am enclosing a cheque to help the Deficit Fund a little..

Tom Brown's letter regarding War Commentary came as an unpleasant surprise. If, what he says is true, and there is nothing to cast doubt upon his veracity so far as I know, then it is a very disturbing and surprising state of affairs for an anarchist organisation. Of course, a man, or a woman for that matter by calling himself an anarchist, does not automatically purge himself of self-seeking and pride. By this we come back to the old question of salvation, a new and better world will come, not as the result of external changes alone, but by a change of heart working inwardly and outwardly. I hope you will forgive this preaching, but it brings me to the remark you made in your address on "Jesus and Humanism," as reported by Hugh Lambert.

I know I am biassed, but I cannot see how you can honestly contend that Jesus was made the superior to Buddha in that Jesus made his actions compatible with his words.

Words without action can be needless vibrations of the atmosphere. But this cannot be said of Gautama Buddha. Buddhism does not rise or fall by the words, however noble or inspiring, of the Buddha, but by following his example, adapting his actions to our particular needs. There is no theory or dogma in Buddhism—it is a way of living, an ethical philosophy. The Buddha showed mankind a way to end suffering, but he did not do this until after he had reached the goal himself. Everything he taught or spoke about was on the result of his personal experience.

Buddhism is a teaching, not concerned with metaphysics, the existence or non-existence of God, but one leading to hope, comfort and happiness for even the most unfortunate.. It is a teaching that offers even to the most wretched of criminals, prospects of final perfection and peace, and this not through blind belief or praver, or asceticism, or outward ceremonies, rites and rituals, but through walking and earnestly persevering on the Noble Eight-fold Path of Inward perfection, purity and emancipation of heart, consisting in Right understanding, Right mindedness, Right speech, Right action, Right livelihood, Right effort, Right attentiveness and Right concentration and peace of mind.

With all this I do not wish to say that the actions of Jesus do not march with His words. I do not wish to criticise the teachings of Jesus at all, especially unfavourably, for one shows respect best for one's own religion by respecting other religions. But I did feel that your remark called for some sort of defence from the Buddhists.

Finally, I must say how much I appreciate the "Word." It has, amongst other virtues, sincerity, which seems to be so sadly lacking in modern life.

With best wishes and kindest regards.—Yours, faithfully,

London, E.10, April 1. G. W. LODGE.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—Would you please send me another copy of the April number as I wish to preserve the letter by Tom Brown. It will, I think, be a valuable document.

The whole affair is very disturbing and may well break up the Freedom Press Group. If the people in question retain their hold on War Commentary it is bound to degenerate into a middle-class "arty-crafty" effort which will alienate the working classes—the people who matter Certain elements connected with "War Commentary" also appear to have a leaning towards armed insurrection as opposed to working-class industrial action. Can we lay this at the same door?

Fraternally yours,

Cranbrook, 5/4/43. A. W. SMITH.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have read your appeals, and I am writing to say I hope readers will reflect, for a few minutes, the thousand pities it would be should you be forced to discontinue publication through lack of support. It is not everyone who realises with what tireless energy and devotion you must work to give us our paper each month, and it would seem so few realise your activities are not actuated by any selfish motives, but from a genuine and sincere desire to help your fellow-men.

I have often said your paper, albeit edited by an Atheist, is doing more to bring nearer to this planet a Kingdom of Peace and Goodwill, than most of the religious publications of Christendom put together.

Generally speaking, the Press, as we know it, are only deceivers and being deceived themselves, our journalists must, for ever, be a barrier to all real progress.

If the Word were increased to 1/- or more, I would have it just the same (and I am a very poor man). To ensure that you would not be short of funds to keep us well informed and put up a fight for those who are placed where they cannot fight for themselves, I suggest that your readers should voluntarily subscribe 6d. per issue, that is, 7s. per year, to receive it post free.

With best wishes.

Romsey. J. DUNCAN.

Dear Aldred,—As you have found my name in the archives you have been so profitably delving in would you be good enough to publish the following:

I attended the Conference with the Communist Party in September, 1931, in my capacity as Whip to the I.L.P. Parliamentary Party. The decision to take part in these conferences was made by the National Conference. I was strongly opposed to the decision but attended the conferences, when necessary, out of loyalty to the Party decision. Naturally the "Daily Worker," as usual, reports mainly the C.P. speakers. Various I.L.P. speakers, including myself, put unpalatable points of view which they did not think it helpful (to them), to report.

I may say that it was the I.L.P. flirtation with the Communists at that time which finally made me leave that Party. I had hoped once we were free from the Labour Party that the I.L.P. would offer a really effective and honest alternative to the workers. The "Brockway" policy of truckling to the strong body of "outside" Communists inside the I.L.P. made this impossible and led to the gradual and painful dissolution of the I.L.P. which we have witnessed during the past ten years.

Yours, etc., JOHN BECKETT.

Rickmansworth, Herts, May 12.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I hope you will be able to carry on your work for many years to come. I heard a lot about you during the last war. Then nothing much until this one. I suppose you left London but you kept to your principles not like some of them who sold themselves. I have enclosed £1 towards the deficit fund. I wish I could follow Mr. Burgess' example.

It is strange people will stand in queues to pay their pennies for the capitalistic lies but an anti-war paper which is worth reading has a difficulty in paying its way. But do not despair.

I am, yours very sincerely,

Twickenham, April 6, 1945. FLORENCE THOMAS.

Dear Comrade,—Last June I forwarded to you a money-order for 10/- as a subscription and donation to your monthly paper, "The Word." At the same time I sent an airgraph to advise you. However, a short time later I received the airgraph back from the censor, who explained that your paper was not allowed into New Zealand. I did not bother to write again for some months, and then I decided to ask my aunt, who lives in London, to forward this letter to you.

I should be pleased if you send me a copy of "The Word" each month. I know that copies do get into the country as I have seen some of them, and liked them very much.

I knew Sidney and Monica Townend, whom you featured in one of your issues last year, while they were in Dunedin.

With best wishes. I am, yours fraternally,

P. A. CLIFFORD.

Dunedin, N.W.2, New Zealand, January 20, 1945.

Dear Guy,—Many thanks for "The Word": the December issue to hand. I like those articles on South Place and similar institutions. We are very much in need of similar humanist and ethicist institutions here. A similar work was suggested in this city recently sponsored by the Lord Mayor and some leading clerics at the Melbourne Town Hall. Humanist work ought to be carried out on a large scale, throughout the Australian Commonwealth.

W. E. COSTAR.

Melbourne, N. 16, Vic., Australia.
January 1, 1945.

Dear Guy,—I have been very interested in reading "The Word" accounts of the activities and speeches of Francis Russell, Duke of Bedford.

I notice that the Duke together with Albermarle, Derby, Lauderdale, and Stanhope signed a protest against the suspension of "Habeas Corpus."

Readers of "The Word" may be interested in this account of the Earl of Stanhope, culled from "Everyman's Encyclopaedia," 1931-32 Edition:

"Charles Stanhope, third Earl of Stanhope (1753-1816), an English politician and scientist, born in London. He entered Parliament in 1780 as member for Wycombe and advocated the cessation of the American War and parliamentary reform. He also opposed the coalition of Fox and North, and attacked Pitt's proposals for a sinking fund. He succeeded to the Peerage in 1786 and became chairman of the "Revolutionary Society" in 1788, openly avowing his republican sentiments. A choleric and arbitrary man but inspired by high motives, he was a remarkable public character in his time, and his thin ungainly figure was mercilessly caricatured by Gillray and other cartoonists. His "Principles of Electricity" (1779), sets out his theory of the 'return stroke' resulting from the contact with earth of lightning; which theory he worked out in fuller detail in the "Philosophical Transactions" for 1789. His daughter was, of course, the famous Lady Hester Stanhope (1776-1839).

I feel that we, the heretics and rebels during this war, have a bond of interest with those revolutionary peers of long ago, and that across the gulf of a century and a half we can, in spirit, shake hands with the rebels and heretics of a bygone age, and sing with William Morris:

"Some had name, and fame, and honour;
Learned they were, and wise and strong;
Some were nameless, poor, unlettered,
Weak in all but grief and wrong.

Named and nameless, all live in us:
One and all they lead us yet,
Every pain to count for nothing,
Every sorrow to forget..

With all best wishes on the struggle.

Yours fraternally,

Spalding, Lincolnshire. NORMAN LEVERITT.

BOOK REVIEW

Mrs. Gladys Bing is a well-known advocate of Social Credit. Her pamphlet, published under the challenging title of In Defence of Luxury, makes a vigorous plea for an order in which real freedom can be enjoyed. She defines "luxury" as "the pleasure of enjoying real wealth; the pleasure of creating beauty and living with it and so receiving its eternal gift of joy." "Make no mistake," she goes on, "a man who spends earnest hours creating a thing of beauty with his own hands reaps a lasting reward in his contemplation of it, as a mother with her children, or a gardener with his plot of land." In the second chapter of the pamphlet Mrs. Bing makes a vigorous attack on the compulsory discipline and planning of life by a bureaucracy, into which we are being dragged. She even advances the interesting theory that physical training of the drill variety has a definite mental effect, inhibiting thought and conditioning the workers' minds to the life of the conveyor-belts of the factories.

Many otherwise enlightened Socialists, in their desire to prevent exploitation by the privileged classes and to secure economic security for the under-priviledged, are rather apt to lose sight of the importance of real freedom for developing the human personality; and real freedom means freedom from the tyranny of bureaucrats as well as freedom from the tyranny of employers. To such, and to readers of many other schools of thought as well, Mrs. Bing's little book may introduce, or emphasise, an important aspect of that realisable Utopia which we all desire, but towards which, at the moment, we are making singularly little progress.

"In Defence of Luxury" is published by the Yeoman Press, 72 Station Road, Taunton, Somerset, and the price is 1s.

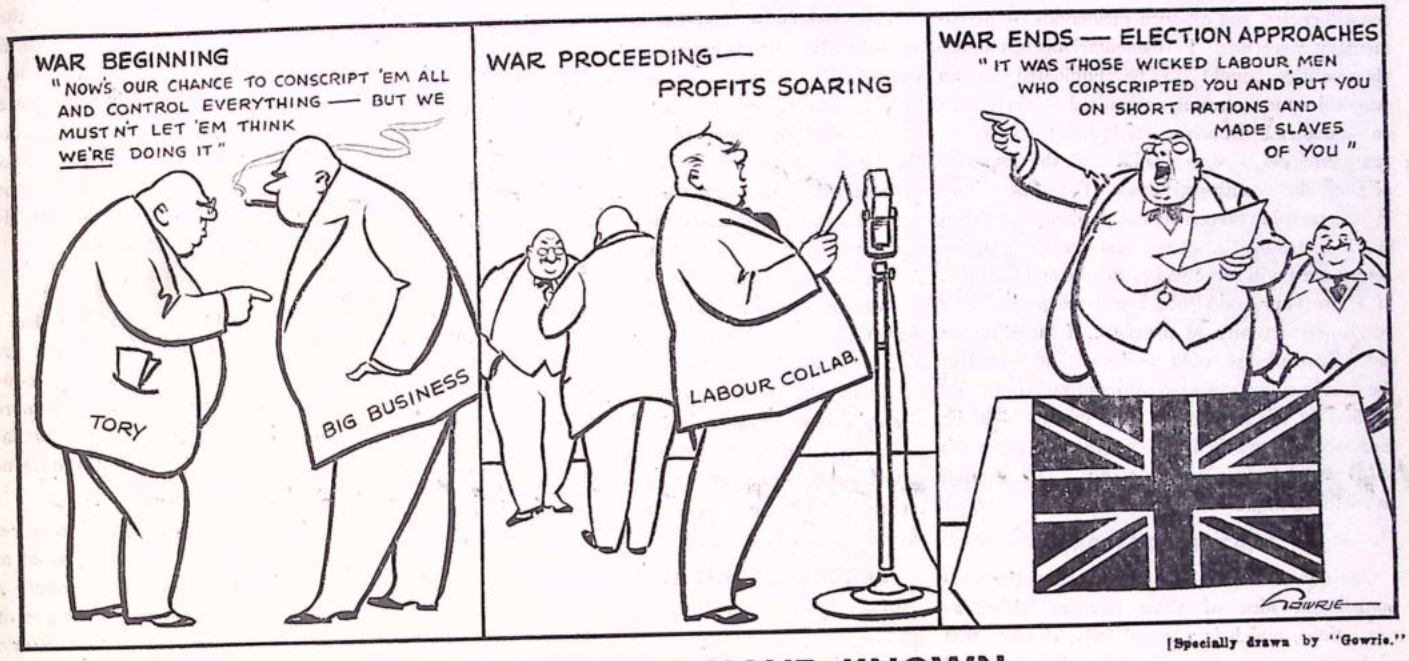
GENERAL ELECTION, 1945

Central Division, Glasgow

Guy Aldred's Election Address



[Specially drawn by "Gawrie."

THEY MIGHT HAVE KNOWN

NO SLOGANS ON HOARDINGS.

Fellow Citizens,—You will not find my name on the hoardings. I have issued no huge posters inviting you to "Vote for Aldred." I have placed no appeals in the windows of the shop at 104 George Street, which is my printing office. I reject all these methods of parliamentary electioneering. I do not even burden the postman with copies of my election address. True, I have sent an address to the Services, because the soldier and sailor and airman abroad needs to learn something about what is happening at home. Actually I do not believe in election addresses. For they are full of bogus promises. The candidate wants you to do something for him. As a rule, if you do not elect him, he seeks another constituency and your struggles are forgotten. He wants you to do something for him. He is not concerned to do something for you. As distinct from the other four candidates who are seeking your votes in this division, I am not asking you to do something for me. I am not seeking a career. I want you merely to give me such status and support as will enable me loyally to serve you. I am the only candidate in this election who has not issued a picture of himself. I take it I am known to you all for I live and move among you freely every day. Anyway, I have no desire to impress you with a fancy picture. My one desire in these dull, dreary, and deadly days, is to use what talents I have to serve you in two ways: to assist you fully in the daily struggle under capitalism; to evolve the struggle under the system into a struggle against the system, until, by our joint efforts, a system of social happiness is established for every one of us. I stand for Socialism and justice, for freedom and plenty.

FORTY-ONE YEARS A SOCIALIST.

I have been forty-one years in the Socialist movement. I was seventeen years of age when I first joined the old Social Democratic Federation. I could not spend a lot of money on electioneering if I wanted to do so; and I would not spend money if I could do so. I have remained poor because I have been loyal to the workers' struggle. I have defended my Socialist ideals in the dock at the Old Bailey, in the High Court at Glasgow, and in the High Court at Edinburgh. Always, I have pleaded my own case and not depended on lawyers. Apart from the High Court, as Glasgow people know, and as your newspapers' records show, I have defended the cause of people constantly in the Police Courts and Sheriff Courts of Lanarkshire. Before that, and since, I have done so in the London Police Courts. The battle for Socialism has been, for me, over a period of forty years, one constant untiring struggle. I believe I have earned the right to represent you, or, at least, to be the delegate of your wrongs. I promise you that I will not betray your trust nor surrender my own integrity.

THE WAR ISSUE.

I wish to say some words on the war issue. I am opposed to war. My opposition to war began with the South African war. Although only a schoolboy I was opposed to that war and participated in the Labour and Socialist protests against it. I have been opposed to war ever since. I opposed the last war; suffered four courts martial: went on work and discipline strike in prison; was released twice under the Cat and Mouse Act, and continued my struggle after my release from prison. I am opposed to war and to the secret diplomacy and the organisation of financial interests that make war possible.

The last war was to give us a land fit for heroes to live in. You know what happened to the heroes when they returned. You know what is happening to the heroes to-day. But the different candidates are much concerned, on paper, and as a preliminary to getting your votes, about housing. They say nothing about secret diplomacy. Whilst houses are being promised to you, secret treaties are being made, your control of foreign policy is made impossible still, and a Third World War is being plotted.

AGAINST ALL CONSCRIPTION.

For that Third World War they want conscription. Military conscription means perpetual industrial conscription. Industrial conscription means control of labour. You have won the war and lost your freedom. I am opposed to conscription. I am opposed to the control of labour. Control Finance. Control Foreign Policy. Control the social use of all wealth that is socially produced. But control the individual freeman or freewoman by controlling and directing his or her own labour power! I say no. My programme is: end all control, all direction of labour; end conscription and regimentation.

NO ELECTION PROMISES BUT A PLEDGE

I do not propose to set out a list of promises and reforms on this programme. I am known to you all and my word is my bond. I do not believe in political caucuses, the nursing of constituencies, and all such incidentals of parliamentary careerism. Parliamentarianism, talking-shop-politics, ought to be liquidated in an economic and culturally organised society, with an industrial franchise, and direct control of representation at every point by the common people: the wealth-producers. I do not believe in irresponsible careerism and parliamentarianism but I do believe in loyalty and service. If you return me I will serve you faithfully and usefully. If I lose your confidence I will resign and give you an opportunity, at the polls, of throwing me out. Such pledge could be drawn and placed in the hands of representative organisations of the electors in the division. The details could be discussed and worked out completely. I am the only candidate to give this pledge. It is sound and will be implemented.

FRATERNIZATION.

One question has arisen—apart from the war-punishment idea of slave German labour as reparations, which is a grand folly of war—that of fraternisation. The four candidates opposed to me uphold the Government's decrees of non-fraternisation, and the imposition of penalties on soldiers who do fraternise. When war is over, the soldier becomes a missionary of peace. Fraternisation is his contribution to the healing of the wounds of war. But I do not say that soldiers should be compelled to fraternise. I say that the common soldier won the war with his suffering, and if he wants to fraternise, no Government and no politician should be permitted to stop him from fraternising. The soldier has earned the individual right to decide in every case.

CHURCHILL, HITLER, AND MUSSOLINI

But for the support given by the Tory and Liberal Parties, and especially by Churchill, to Mussolini and Hitler during their rise to power, notwithstanding their political persecutions and concentration camps, this war would not have occurred. The Tory and Liberal candidates should be rejected, whatever their individual war record, since the pre-war political record of their parties prepared the way for the debacle of war.

Both these parties stand for conscription in peace-time, which means the regimentation of labour. When the soldier returns to civvy street he will curse himself and his relatives if his vote and their vote perpetuate conscription. I am opposed to all military and industrial conscription and to all controls and direction of labour. I would control finance not labour-power. The doctrine of social credit cannot be substituted for Socialism, but the idea that money is merely a medium or measure of exchange, and not a commodity in itself, is a sound one. Money, so long as money is tolerated — and I believe in the complete abolition of the money system—should be reduced to true use-function and not be permitted to exist as a parasite exploiter of labour, the organiser of secret diplomacy, and the vested interest dabbling in, rejoicing in, and manufacturing wars. Labour ought to be free and wealth, which is social, ought to be socialised. The enjoyment of wealth should be individual. Its use, in the creation of further wealth, ought not to be a private monopoly.

COMMUNISTS AND HITLER.

The Communist candidate refers to his war record and recalls his exploits in Spain. The real opponents of Franco were the Anarchists of the C.N.T. As regards the present war, let it be recalled that my Communist opponent supported the Peace Convention and stood at Greenock as a Peace-with-Hitler candidate in June, 1941. He was withdrawn because Hitler violated the pact with the Soviet Union on Sunday, June 22, 1941, in favour of the Labour War candidate. Ribbentrop signed a Pact of Friendship with the Soviet Union, at Moscow, on August 23, 1939. This pact freed Germany from all fear of attack by Soviet Russia and made war on the Western Front, against France and therefore, Britain, inevitable. Let this be remembered. The Communist candidate is not a real Communist and he merely obeys the voice and interest of the Kremlin.

LABOUR CANDIDATE'S RECORD.

I am told that the Labour candidate has nursed the constituency. What a record! The country has been at war. Europe has been devastated: suffering consumes the entire world, and a Labour candidate, nominally a Socialist, dares to tell us that he has nursed the constituency. What for? For your good? For the good of the returning soldier? For the good of the soldier's wife or children? For the good of the ordinary tenement dweller? or for his own good?

When it was announced that I was standing, the papers stated that I said I expected to lose my deposit. It was added that my campaign was not to be taken seriously. The statement is false and the comment expresses the pious hopes of my opponents and of the capitalist class. I do not expect and I do not aim to lose my deposit. Because I do not disfigure the hoardings with posters, it does not follow that I expect to lose. I aim to win but I am prepared to lose.

THE HOUSING QUESTION.

The Glasgow Herald (20/6/1945) says that.

The need for better homes—the Central Division can certainly show some wretched examples of bad housing—and social security are being stressed by all the candidates now, with news of Mr. Guy Aldred's intervention as an Independent Socialist, numbering five.

But why now? Why because I was intervening? And why the desire to have my candidature not taken seriously? Why am I the outsider?

The retiring Tory member has held the Seat since the death of Bonar Law in 1923. What has he done for housing in the division? The Labour candidate has represented the Townhead Ward in the Council for two elections. What has he done? I am the outsider, the untipped and much derided horse. I say: Back the outsider to win and so give the know-alls their answers.

When the polling is over, the Tory, Liberal, official Labour and "Communist" candidates will be inclined to tear off the last posters themselves, from the fear that their electioneering slogans will recoil on their own heads, and mock them through the remaining days of their public life. My election manifestoes will stand and be reissued as definitions of the struggle. I use no slogans but remain with you in the struggle, witnessing against war and want until both are conquered, and happiness becomes the lot of mankind from the cradle to the grave. To me, this is not a special contest from which I want to emerge a glorified careerist. But it is part of a great struggle in which I want to be your voice. Elect me—and see how I will fight. If I do not fight for you, recall me and dismiss me. I place my promise to resign if I cannot fight for you in your hands. But I will fight for you—loyally and well. Give me the sporting chance.

WHAT CAN BE DONE?

No candidate can do anything for you that I cannot do. In the daily struggle I can serve you as well as any other candidate. This you know. And in the social struggle I will serve you more thoroughly because I am inspired by a fundamental principle that I have held to in imprisonment and poverty for over forty years.

I am opposed to war. I am opposed to secret diplomacy and secret treaties. I am opposed to indirect control of Foreign Policy through a League of Governments, miscalled a League of Nations. I am in favour of a definite World Government and World Federation. What this means, and how it means and spells Peace for ever, I will explain at my meetings, or to any elector who, individually, questions me.

HOSPITAL ISSUE: TREATMENT OF NURSES: A PLEDGE.

The fact that the Royal Infirmary is situate in the Central Division directs attention to the organisation and administration of hospitals. Of course, hospitals should be publicly supported and socialised, which is not the same as being nationalised and controlled by a bureaucracy. The conditions under which the nurses work and live is one of inadequately rewarded tyranny. I promise to go into this matter fully with the nurses concerned and to see that the wrongs are ventilated and remedied as far as possible, pending that coming change that can come only with the establishment of Socialism. I will throw a searchlight on hospital conditions.

I can say no more.

I ask for your vote. By my record and my struggles I am the one candidate who should command it.

My literature will be circulated at my meetings. Essays and pamphlets I have written over the years will be distributed freely. I have withdrawn not one pamphlet from circulation for my views are not changed. I am unrepentant of all my thoughts and writing. If you believe in social freedom and security, you will vote for me.

Yours in Citizenship.

PARLIAMENTARIANS AND FASCISM

WHEN THEY HONOURED MUSSOLINI

IN THE ROMAN FORUM
His Late Majesty King George V. shaking hands with Signor Mussolini in his first year of office. Marconi and the world watched the event.

In eulogising Mussolini, the Tory, Liberal, and Labour parliamentarians built up Fascism and made the Second World War inevitable. You have paid for it in blood, toil, sweat, and tears.

In 1923, Britain was living under the Tory Government of Stanley Baldwin, later Earl Baldwin.

On May 6th, 1923, King George V conferred the Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath on Signor Benito Mussolini. A number of Mussolini's lieutenants were made Knights Commander of the Royal Victorian Order. Sir Benito was the first foreigner to receive this distinction since General Deniken, when the latter was warring on the Soviet Workers' Republic in the days of Lenin and Trotsky, and the pioneer Socialist believers in the Soviet Union.

Churchill was a party to both these honours being conferred.

Speaking in Rome on May 11, 1923, in reply to a welcome from the municipality, the British Monarch said of Fascism and its chief :—

Knowing, as I do, the traditional qualities of the Italian race, their loyalty, their valour, and their determination: recollecting, as I do, the crisis from which they have recently emerged under the wise leadership of a powerful statesman, I look forward with confidence not only to the future association of our two peoples in the cause of peace and progress, but to the continued triumph of the high intellectual and spiritual ideals which they jointly represent.

Churchill and the Tory Press approved of this speech made in the name of the British people. The Tories laid the foundation of Fascism.

But Ramsay MacDonald, evolved into a statesman by Labour Parliamentarism, also approved of Mussolini.

NAZI-SOVIET PACT

(See Picture, page 3)

August, 1939: Stalin's Agreement with Nazi Germany. Ribbentrop, German Foreign Minister has come to Moscow. He signs on August 23, 1939, the Pact of Friendship between the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany. Molotov and Stalin stand behind him. This Pact freed Germany from all fear of attack by the Soviet Union. It made World War inevitable and allowed Hitler to march.

The Communist Party of Great Britain then organised the Peace Convention and opposed the war against Germany. This caused "The Daily Worker" to be suppressed.

In 1941, My Communist opponent was nominated against the War Coalition Labour candidate at Greenock as a Communist Peace-with-Hitler candidate. The pact was broken, without warning, at dawn, on Sunday, June 22, 1941, when Hitler invaded the Soviet Union, without troubling to make a formal declaration of war. Stalin had faithfully kept his pact with Hitler to that date, and the "Communist" line in Britain was anti-war. Hitler broke his pact with Stalin—and the "Communist" candidate, no longer anti-war, was withdrawn from Greenock in favour of the Labour Coalition War candidate. This is the "Communist" record. A foreign Government dictates its programme and policy.

ELECTION STOP PRESS.

The printing and publishing of this issue of "The Word" has been delayed owing to the fact that a few comrades of the United Socialist Movement and the United Peace Campaign decided to raise the Pacifist Socialist challenge in the Central Division of Glasgow at the General Election, with Comrade Guy A. Aldred as the candidate. As most of our readers know, Guy Aldred and his supporters have no faith in Parliament, but they felt it was their duty to challenge militarism, conscription, and war, and to ask the workers to register their protest against the continuation of war and the Nationalist Imperialist policies which, if continued, must lead inevitably to a Third World War. Imperialism is supported by ALL the parliamentarians from blue to red, with the not-too-emphatic exception of the I.L.P.

Tremendous propaganda meetings have taken place in the district and thousands of manifestoes have been distributed. There has been great sympathy and understanding for our point of view.

All this has involved us in heavy financial difficulties. Apart from the necessary candidate's deposit, printing expenses have been heavy. WE APPEAL TO ALL COMRADES TO RALLY TO OUR SUPPORT AND HELP EASE THIS BURDEN. This is your challenge. It must be your responsibility.

A copy of the election manifestoes and leaflets will be sent to any comrades who wish it, post free.

Address all letters to the STRICKLAND PRESS, 104 George Street, Glasgow, C.1.

THIS SCANDALOUS ELECTION

By C. H. NORMAN

A good many years ago the present writer composed a pamphlet entitled "The Conspiracy against the People," the argument of which was that the real purpose of political parties was the deception of the people concerning the quality and nature of the government suffered by them. The late Lord Brentford paid it the compliment of seizing and destroying all the copies during an industrial upheaval. The present election could not be improved on as an example of the truths propounded in that little pamphlet.

Consider the facts.

A number of people have been united in a Cabinet which has been carrying on a ferocious war by the methods of barbarism for some years when suddenly the war ends. These persons (who had been lauding each other and their chief, Mr. Churchill, in language which would have been extravagant if applied to the noblest of mankind) suddenly decided to part company, as the public, apparently, must be entertained by a clown's harlequinade after the grim pantomime of the anti-German war. In the period during which the war had been carried on, these people had agreed in denying their constitutional rights to the voting masses.

All kinds of measures were passed, for which there was not a shadow of authority given to these ministers or their supporters in the House of Commons at the election of 1935. The electors, one would have thought in the circumstances, might have been invited to express some opinion on this exceptional abuse of the authority reposed in the Ministers and members of the House. Not a bit of it. Are the electors to be asked to pronounce upon the propriety of industrial conscription? None of the Party leaders has mentioned the subject. Are the electors to be asked to indicate their approval or otherwise of the Japanese war? Not a bit of it. However one may disapprove of the "methods of barbarism" being used against the Japanese, both sides are agreed that the war against Japan will be carried on by these foul methods of concentrated bombing whoever is elected to office. Are the electors to be asked whether they approve of female conscription? Not a bit of it. Silence reigns supreme on that subject. Are the electors to be asked whether they approve of the continuance of military conscription? Not a bit of it. Are the electors to be asked whether they approve of the income tax on wages? Silence! Are the electors to be asked whether they approve of a system of rationing which Colonel Llewellin, the Minister of Food, told the Surveyors' Institution in February last, had reduced the food consumed by the community by 50 per cent. per week since September, 1939? Certainly not.

Are the electors to be asked whether they approve of a system of the distribution of food which costs £1 to secure the distribution of £1 in value of food as against 5/- per £1 in value Silence is complete on both sides. Are the electors to be asked whether they approve of the use of the balances in the Unemployment Fund for the purpose of financing food subsidies instead of being built up for the object for which the Fund was instituted? Not a bit of it. Silence is complete on boths ides. Are the electors to be asked to pronounce on a financial system which debases the money in which wages and salaries are paid to this extent, as stated by Sir John Anderson, Chancellor of the Exchequer, on June 1, 1945, in the House of Commons: "The domestic purchasing power of the pound sterling, taking 1914 as twenty shillings, was 12/10 in 1938, and 8/4 in 1944." That means that a wage of £3 a week in 1914 was worth 25/- a week in purchasing power in 1944 and is certainly worth less to-day. The silence of the politicians and of the Press is absolute on this question. Neither "The Daily Herald," nor "Reynolds News," nor "The New Statesman," referred in any way to that momentous admission. Why not? Because Governments, all drawn from all political parties, have been in office since 1914, but none has checked this currency debasement.

Need one enter on any further demonstration of this political chicanery which is kept going by the bribes of paid posts and honours lists? The question in the constituencies will be, which of two or three persons, who are going to keep up this conspiracy against the people shall one vote for? Indeed, it is a pretty dilemma.

One can understand the necessity to inflame the agitation about war criminals in Europe. But for this agitation the attention of the British people might be turned upon the war criminals at home. Some questions which might be formulated are these: Who was really responsible for entering into the Polish guarantee? What was the purpose of it? Supposing Mr. Churchill had not been Minister of Defence could the war have been ended in 1942? Was not the war unduly prolonged by perpetual incompetence in the high military, naval, and air commands? How many times were British troops or Allied troops bombed by their own aircraft? How many prison camps in Germany have been bombed by Allied aircraft? What are the facts about the abuses committed by the American Army of Occupation in Britain against the British civilian population? What are the facts concerning the abuses connected with the billeting regulations and the damage done by the British forces to British homes where they have been billeted? What are the facts about the Calais, the Norwegian, and the Arnhem expeditions?

These would all appear to be matters upon which the public might properly expect information hitherto denied it by the operations of the British censor. But are the political leaders or the Press organs offering any information on these points? Not a word. Silence reigns supreme. What has been going on in the military detention barracks on the Continent and elsewhere? What was the truth about the sinking in the Channel of the Arandora Star? There has been a great decline in public vigilance in this respect compared with the last war. An inquiry was held then into the Mesopotamia disaster and Dardanelles fiasco. An inquiry was held into the sinking of the Lusitania. The fact that war was proceeding against Germany was not regarded as an excuse for wholesale hushing-up between 1914-1918. Mr. Churchill has every reason to fear an investigation into his conduct of this disastrous war: but he has protected himself by the clever device of incriminating and involving the leading members of the other parties, so that all have a common interest in maintaining "hush-hush" on the gross and shocking abuses which have been the feature of the government of Britain in the last ten years.

"CONCHIES"

CLEARING UP SOME MISCONCEPTIONS

By Arthur Deeson.

Are the "Conchies" receiving a square deal in the minds of the public? I think not. Fostered by some newspapers very many injustices have been perpetrated against them, if not in action at least in thought. I am not arguing for or against pacifism, I myself am not a registered pacifist, but I do think that people generally might realise that they are fighting for, amongst other things, tolerance. The freedom of expressing one's own view freely is surely the hallmark of democracy, and if an opinion is sincere, it should be treated with respect, if understanding is not possible.

During the last few months I have worked in a community, which although not avowedly pacifist has a large membership of C.O.'s. They are engaged on social relief work of a general nature in the East End of London, and in work and recreation I have had many opportunities for observing them closely. Also I have made a point of collecting some views on "conchies," coming from a fairly average cross-section of the people of this country. Three views are particularly widespread, damaging and in my experience, inaccurate.

The first is perhaps the least widespread. This is the opinion that the C.O. is a coward. Least widespread because a few minutes intelligent thought will disprove of the theory.

Only think for one moment what it means to be a pacifist. On a declaration of his views he is at once separated from 99 per cent. of a war-time population; he may lose many of his friends, receive the condemnation of his relatives and wherever he goes he will have to defend his faith against numbers of hostile arguers. The pacifist in war-time is a lonely person, his nerves are sometimes stretched to breaking point by the antagonism of his fellow beings. Then he has to face a tribunal and if he cannot satisfy the adjudicators he is sent to prison. When he is released he is allowed to do work of a certain nature, agriculture, social service, or something of this sort. He works for little or no pay, his chances of employment after the war are meagre.

Can this rigorous and solitary life be called cowardice? No, surely it is much easier to follow the crowd and serve in the army than to be individualistic and lonely because of an intangible ideal.

The second view, probably the most widespread, is that the Pacifist is lazy. Early this summer the Sunday Express gave much prominence to this opinion. "Farmers rage at 'sunbathing conchies.'" "They spend their time behind the hedges reading." "They cannot be sacked for loafing" ran the headlines and under them two anonymous farmers were quoted, criticising unspecified C.O. land workers. The influence this article had on public opinion was tremendous. However, the C.B.C.O. Bulletin (Central Board for Conscientious Objectors), (Official Magazine of Pacifists) published a reply in the June issue. It was reasonable in its style and tone if not altogether convincing. It did not pretend to clear up every allegation against the C.O.s, that was obviously impossible, but it did at least destroy some of the sensationalism of the Sunday Express article and that paper's follow up was considerably fairer in outlook. "Some bad, some good, is the verdict" ran their headline. But the damage had already been done. Their premature and lurid sensationalism had had its desired effect. The C.B.C.O. had made their reply, but as they themselves pointed out their circulation is three to four thousand while the readers of the Sunday Express number nearly two millions.

Writing from my own experience I regret I cannot give the C.O. an entirely clean bill in this respect. I have met C.O.s who are ashamedly selfish slackers. They are usually intensely impractical and over-intellectualised, in some cases definitely psychologically unfitted for manual labour. But these types are in my opinion, greatly in minority and at the community from which I am writing there is only one man who tends to be a slacker—it is only a tendency—but unfortunately he cannot claim any excuse.

For the rest of them I can find none of the pettiness and shoving off of responsibility which characterises so many factories and offices. Little or no supervision is needed and the Borough for whom we work recognises this. I am proud to say that whatever job they allot us, even if it is a new one, receives no outside supervision. They know they can trust us to do the piece of work as quickly as possible, and we are left in peace. This summer this community has worked much harder (and with an immeasurably better will and a surer conception) than the majority of the civilian population. Fifteen people, they answered every call of this much bombed Borough, often arriving with their canteen before the Civil Defence. Several incidents often took place in the area in one night, two or three cars might be called out and that would mean that the whole house was aroused, boilers had to be stoked, urns of tea made, sandwiches cut. But the next day breakfasts would be at 6.30, as usual, stores deliveries and school dinner deliveries would be made, the attendants would go to the local scabies clinic, blast walls, Morrison and Anderson shelters would be erected, all these duties would be done just as usual although nobody had had more than two hours sleep. Flying bombs fell twice within twenty yards of the house, till this day it bears the scars, every window is boarded up, the ceilings are down, many of the interior walls are cracked and broken. But nobody quit, they all, these "lazy Conchies," carried on.

Very closely linked with the opinion I have just examined is the view that pacifists are "pansies," "cissie boys," long haired impractical idealists. To this I can only reply that out of the fifty and sixty C.O.s I have known reasonably well since the war started, only one answered in any way to this description, and she was a woman. Some of my pacifists friends are not so encouraging in their verdict. They say that they have met several of this type early in the war, but none recently. Strange—can the "pansies" all have died, or has it been knocked out of them?

SOCIALISM — THE ONLY WAY

By JOHN JENNINGS

We are now living, and suffering, in the throes of what is probably the final and most highly developed stage of the development of capitalism. Monopolistic production, bank capital, and in the field of politics, Fascism, are its salient characteristics. As a matter of fact, the system is going one beyond the phase of gargantuan private enterprises, and State Capitalism is the coming thing. Soviet Russia is State Capitalist; so, with differences of procedure, is Nazi Germany, though there (early 1945) big private concerns are still the order of the day. A similarly directioned trend is apparent in other highly developed countries. "Controlled" Capitalism bids fair to become fashionable in Britain, and this is what the almost inevitable post-war victory of the Labour Party is likely to attain. State investment, and/or control of private investment, is likely to become popular in the United States. "Spheres of influence" — and exploitation — are important facets of modern imperialism.

All this helps to lead to the already inescapable conclusion that the establishment of — real— Socialism is the only way to get a decent social order anywhere. And that must involve the abolition of the wages system, the inauguration of "production for use instead of profit," and the absolute ending of the capitalist system (with emphasis on the adjective "capitalist"). Neither money nor things must function as capital (i.e., something to which labour power is applied to produce profits: it matters little whether the ownership be private or "public"—"State": capitalism is always capitalism: Karl Marx foresaw the emergence of State Capitalism).

The outstanding, the most terrible, debased, cruel, inhuman feature of capitalism is the fact that it leads to war. Contending, competing interests must inevitably sooner or later collide; and the State must go with its economic interests —for the State is nothing but the Social Power of those interests—under private capitalism and State capitalism, the State is the social power of the economic system on which the nation operates —at one time of society, yet above society; dragging society with it to the heights, and the depths, of its crises; at the worst, plunging society into the bloody vortices of its inevitable wars.

Reform of the monetary system would, I agree, solve many of our social problems; but I fail to see how it could assuredly prevent war. For this, we must abolish capitalism and the wages system. There must be NO capital, eventually no money, even as an easy medium of exchange. But instead, a plenitude of goods and services, and the only title to the use of them, need, and the fact that one had contributed whatever one was able to the necessary work of production, distribution, etc. Socialism is essential; and I am sorry that in coming to this conclusion I must conflict with the Duke of Bedford, with whose advocacy of monetary reform I should be wholeheartedly in agreement if I believed that under capitalism there was any hope for humanity at all. Integral in all forms of imperialism is investment, which always necessitates territorial domination, and motivates conquest and defence.

THE WALDON ROUND ROBIN AND FELLOWSHIP

Philip and Eleanor Mayer of 177 Front Street, Brea, Ohio, are engaged in perhaps the most unique and significant type of liberal religious program anywhere in this country. It is Humanistic without bearing the label, or any label at all for that matter, unless it be that of Naturalism which is closely related to the philosophy of Humanism. They edit and publish a most delightful periodical, "The Walden Round Robin," which is "A digest of friendly letters among seekers of Overflowing Life." Membership in "The Walden Fellowship" is only $1.00 a year.

NOTES AND COMMENTS
BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

On May 7th, Count von Krosigk, the German Foreign Minister, broadcast the following statement :—

We must now face our fate squarely and unquestioningly. Nobody can be in any doubt that the future will be difficult for each one of us, and will exact sacrifices from us in every sphere of life. We must accept this burden, and stand loyally by the obligations we have undertaken. But we must not despair and fall into mute resignation. Once again we must set ourselves to stride along the path through the dark future . . . In our nation justice shall be the supreme law and the guiding principle. We must also recognise law as the basis of all relations between the nations. We must recognise it and respect it from inner conviction.

Respect for treaties will be as sacred as the aim of our nation to belong to the European family of nations as a member of which we want to mobilise all human, moral and material forces in order to heal the dreadful wounds which the war has caused. Then we may hope that the atmosphere of hatred which to-day surrounds Germany all over the world will give place to a spirit of reconciliation among the nations without which the world cannot recover. . . . We may hope that our freedom will be restored to us, without which no nation can lead a bearable and dignified existence. We wish to devote the future of our nation to the return of the inmost and best forces of German nature, which have given to the world imperishable works and values.

On May 3rd, Reich Minister Speer, a Nazi, spoke of "meeting the enemy with dignity and self-assurance" and of "becoming more unassuming in ourselves and exercising self-criticism."

Both these utterances by German statesmen show dignity and good feeling and contrast very favourably with the announcement of plans for America's part in the military government of Germany, which appeared in the Times of May 12th :—

The function of military control is not to please the civilian population or even make them comfortable, but to enforce regulations and to maintain order. Moreover, the military government is not concerned with feeding the defeated Germans or rehabilitating their cities. The principal aim of the military government will be to cleanse Germany of Nazism and to re-establish the rule of justice and equality before the law.

American officers in high position have been responsible for a good many very unpleasant utterances, some considerably worse than the announcement just quoted, and it will be well for the future peace of the world if enlightened public opinion in America takes prompt and vigorous steps to keep them and their policies in proper control.

It is beginning to look more and more as though the projected trial of war criminals is going to result either in a somewhat ludicrous fiasco, (which is probably the best that can be hoped for); or in an ugly display of vindictive spite and hysterical anger, at variance with all the best traditions of civilised countries. As I have said before, I have no objection to the trial of genuine war criminals, provided that a really impartial tribunal can be set up and the whole results of the trial are made public. Is it, however, possible at the present time to secure either of these conditions? The gilt is, moreover, taken off the gingerbread of the justice of these trials by the unfortunate fact that there are quite as many war criminals and persons guilty of brutal administration of concentration camps on the Allied side as on that of the Axis.

The behaviour of the French Government and of many other governments of liberated countries, in treating all collaborators, if not as war criminals, at any rate as traitors, is particularly repellent and serves only to demonstrate the extent to which the faults of the Axis governments are shared by their opponents. Once a country has been completely defeated and occupied, collaboration with the occupying Power is frequently an act of patriotism and common sense, as it can be used to temper the severity of the occupation and reduce the number of enemy officials.

At the time of writing (June 1st) it looks as though there is at least a possibility of our resuming war with our gallant French Allies. When they were first defeated by Germany, we killed a good many of them in Syria and Madagascar because they objected to our occupying their territory for strategic purposes. When Hitler occupied the Netherlands for strategic purposes, it was somehow quite different, but then he was a brutal Nazi and we are the champions of freedom and the rights of small nations, particularly those in Eastern Europe. What a game!

* * *

It is recorded in the Press that an Oxford don, visiting the "infamous concentration camp at Belsen," found there fifteen hundred little children, who told him that they would like to sing, and after he had taken them as far away as possible from the corpses, they proceeded to do so. It is further recorded that in the camp was an orchestra maintained by the S.S. and composed of prisoners from seven countries. The inmates of this camp must have been remarkably musical or else it would appear that the conditions were not quite so "infamous" as the Press would have us believe!

Forward has, during the past few weeks, contained many admirable leading articles. In the issue of May 5th, the Editor, writing on the subject of starvation in concentration camps, calls attention to the fact that whereas British people and Parliamentary leaders express the utmost horror when German opponents of the government are starved by German officials, no similar feeling was experienced when, after the last war, German women and children were deliberately starved by the blockade orders of British officials until, in the words of The Observer, "our own sound-hearted manly troops, seeing it, could not endure it." A starvation blockade was also carried out against Russia, with equally terrible results, but so far no propaganda films of the victims have been shown in this country. Is it strange that foreigners call us a nation of hypocrites?

At a time when it is not as easy as one could wish to find anything pleasant to record about Russian policy, it is gratifying to learn that a sharp official snub has been administered by the head of the Propaganda Department of the Central Committee of the Communist Party to Ilya Ehrenburg, the Vansittartist editor of The Red Star.

It was also reported a few months ago that Russia had been giving a fair amount of help to Finland in the matter of obtaining food supplies.

Roy Walker, in an article in Peace News, writes :—

Which is easier—to persuade national governments to renounce the use of arms, and therefore the ability to manoeuvre for power, or to persuade the peoples to refuse armaments and the power to declare, even to their governments?

* * *

In a train not long ago I overheard the conversation of two prosperous-looking Englishmen. One said that he had recently met two English soldiers returned from Germany, one of whom had on wrist watches from wrist to shoulder of one arm; while the other had gone up to a German civilian and asked him the time. The German pulled out a gold watch and told him the time, whereon the English soldier said, "Thanks. I'll have that," and walked off with the gold watch. My fellow-travellers seemed thoroughly amused by what they evidently considered a smart bit of work. Although the treatment of prisoners by both British and German soldiers is normally friendly and decent, dirty dogs do occur, but they are not an Axis monopoly!

A leading article in The Catholic Herald contains some wise words of warning :

Victory can hasten a process of decline as certainly as can defeat, and it can indicate far more accurately the stage we have reached. . . . To-morrow we or our children may not be victorious. Should we wish to be judged then by the standards we are setting and in terms of the propaganda we are putting over? Could mankind survive above an animal level if our present behaviour were universalised?

Socialists are rather apt to regard Franco's regime with extreme disfavour and to have a sympathy for the government which he displaced. Starting with an inclination in favour of the latter, information I have received from time to time has led me to conclude the provisional judgment that whatever the faults of Franco's régime may be, his party is, on the whole, less objectionable than were its opponents, the Anarchists excepted.

A writer in The Evening Standard states that an absence of low wages and high cost of living is one of the most satisfactory attributes of the Franco régime. Franco appointed non-political architects and engineers to reconstruct towns and villages ruined in the civil war. Agricultural labourers' cottages are so good that they would be described in England as detached villas. The State pays the entire cost of these houses, workmen being charged five days' earnings per month according to regional standards—an average of about 10/- a month's rent.

Workmen's flats in the suburbs of Madrid and other big cities are far ahead of L.C.C. construction. The State again pays all the costs, demanding an average of five days' earnings per month as rent.

That incomparable fountain of emotional humbug, The National Savings Committee, concerned with presenting anti-inflation taxation in a pleasing guise, has published a sketch of a young woman, apparently one-legged, and, if one could see her face, possibly also one-eyed, who is contemplating a sunrise in an attitude of ecstasy! At the side is written :

A great day has dawned. With our hearts filled with thankfulness for victory, let us make this great resolve! Let us continue in our striving for a land free from anxiety and want—that the sacrifices of war may not have been in vain.

It would be difficult to conceive anything more unimaginative or unconvincing than Field Marshal Montgomery's explanation to the German people of the reason for the non-fraternisation policy and the aim it is intended to achieve. Have English leaders in war-time lost all power of putting themselves in the other fellow's place and realising how, human nature and circumstances being what they are, he will inevitably react to certain arguments?

What does it matter, as far as the chances of securing lasting peace are concerned, whether the Germans do, or do not, admit that they were beaten in the last war? Lasting peace will depend solely on the absence of grievances and injustice of a kind which will provide material for war propaganda in the future. "The German people, after the frightful sufferings of the last few years, lacks all means of defending its honour by external action. Yielding to overwhelming force, but without, on that account, abandoning its views in regard to the unheard-of injustice of the conditions of peace, the Government of the German Republic, therefore, declares that it is ready to accept and sign the conditions of peace imposed by the Allied and Associated Governments." Even if these words had not been spoken by the German delegation before agreeing to the Treaty of Versailles, would the British nation, or any other nation of spirit, lie down under permanent injustice and be deterred from a fresh trial of strength, even if they had admitted that, largely by the weight of superior numbers and superior economic resources, they had been overpowered on a previous occasion? Would they not always hope, with new weapons, new allies, and more perfect leadership or organisation, to be able to do better next time?

Field Marshal Montgomery apparently attempts to revive the old idea of Germany's sole responsibility for the last war. How can he expect the Germans to accept this when our own former Prime Minister and several other distinguished non-German political leaders have admitted that responsibility for the last war by no manner of means rested solely on Germany? How can he expect them to believe that their leaders "wantonly" unleashed war in 1939 when they quite naturally believe that we encouraged the Poles to resist not unreasonable demands for Danzig and a route across the Corridor, yet have since allowed Russia to take far more Polish territory, and interfere far more with Polish freedom, than Hitler proposed doing by the terms he offered in 1939?

Field Marshal Montgomery goes on to suggest that orders of non-fraternisation are issued in order to bring home to the German people their responsibility for supporting the Nazi leaders and their policy. He completely ignores the large section of the German population who have always been anti-Nazi, and how can he possibly expect even pro-Nazi Germans to feel particularly guilty when Mr. Churchill has attributed the rise to power of the Nazis to the mistakes made by the Allies after the last war, and himself, at one time, warmly commended Hitler as the kind of leader the English would have been fortunate to find had their position resembled that of Germany? How can he blame the Germans for not resisting a government ruthless towards political enemies at home and unmindful of the rights of small nations, when we are perfectly willing to fraternise with the Russian people, in so far as we are allowed to do so, who are guilty of precisely similar offences, if offences they be?

Field Marshal Montgomery complains that the German people applauded their Nazi leaders during the period of German victories. Did not British people belonging to the Liberal and Labour Parties applaud Mr. Churchill under similar circumstances, although now they seem disposed to become highly critical towards him?

Judging by some reports which are reaching us, the Russians are by no means disposed to imitate the absurd policy of non-fraternisation. Putting on one side all considerations of Christian duty and ordinary common sense, does not sheer political expediency suggest that the sooner we come to our senses on this matter, the better it will be for Europe and the entire world?

General Eisenhower is reported to have said that the non-fraternisation order is being relaxed in the case of relations with very young German children. Would it not be a good plan if relations between the occupying troops and the people of the defeated countries were no longer conducted after a fashion which one would expect only from a very young schoolboy?

o o o

A singularly contemptible example of kicking a man, and even a man's wife, when he is down, has recently been provided even by the supposedly more reputable of our daily papers, in their references to the wife of William Joyce ("Lord Haw-Haw") as "the woman alleged to be his wife," or "the woman living with him at the time." It is a well-known fact that Joyce was legally married in a perfectly normal fashion, and his marriage is a good deal more respectable than some of the liaisons of the owners or editors of those sections of the Press which, without a shadow of foundation, have gratuitously suggested that he is immoral in his private life.

o o o

It has been recently reported that two German boys, aged 16 and 17, were executed for spying on United States troops last February, when the war, of course, was still in progress. Had conditions been reversed, boys similarly engaged in England would be acclaimed as little heroes and if they had been executed, those responsible for their death would have been added to the list of war criminals. If conscience tends to make cowards of men, how much more does war tend to make men hypocrites!

THE CHURCH & CONSCIENCE

THE SUPREME COURT CHALLENGED

By LOWELL H. COATE, M.A., Ph.D.
(Superintendent, the Humanist Society of Friends, U.S.A.)

It is a well-known fact that literally millions of Christians in many countries during the past twenty centuries have gladly chosen a martyr's death rather than violate their consciences, when merely to raise an index finger would have saved their lives, thereby indicating their willingness to renounce their freedom of conscience and religion. At such a price has freedom been purchased, and no worthy son or daughter of that faith will remain silent while intolerant tyranny undertakes to raise its head in the new western world which was built on the fundamental foundations of freedom.

How extensive this conscientious objection to war has become was disclosed when more than ten thousand American Protestant clergymen registered their purpose not to take part as combatants in, nor give their blessing to, any future war. Less than one-half of the 53,000 Protestant ministry in the United States was canvassed. Out of 19,372 who replied to the questionnaire more than 10,000 took the definite position against war. This result was a relevation even to the peace leaders themselves. It clearly indicated that the Christian conscience was reaching the point of complete emancipation from the traditional fallacies and rationalisations with which it has long cloaked its compromise of the name of Christ with that which is most antithetical to his religion. As The Christian Century avers:

These ministers can have no doubt of the gravity of their decision. It is without precedent since the early days of the Church before Constantine flattered Christianity into becoming a private chaplain to the state. These men did not reach their position thoughtlessly. That is inconceivable. Many a hand must have trembled when indicating its answer to the questionnaire.

Other millions of Christian citizens will unite in sentiment with the proclamation of this courageous Journal of Religion to defend, in the name of both religion and patriotism, the ten thousand ministers who did register their declaration that they were "done with the butchery and barbarism of war forever."

Dr. Macintosh was declined a re-hearing by the United States Supreme Court.

How many readers who followed the discussion of this case are prepared to consider this matter closed for all time? How many Christians will consent that the Supreme Court shall tear out of their Bibles the foundation text of all their spiritual teaching, "Behold brethren, we ought to obey God rather than man." How many Christians will dare to stand with Dr. Morrison, editor of The Christian Century, in declaring:

For one, I, a native-born citizen of the United States, will not give my consent to this new doctrine. I will give everything I have for the well-being of the state, including my life, but I cannot give my conscience. That belongs to God. I repudiate the obligation which the Supreme Court would impose upon me, and declare that the imposition of such an obligation is the essence of tyranny. I refuse to be bound by it.

This nation was founded upon the principle of the separation of church and state, but if we are no longer permitted to have a conscience which the state will recognise, and if the state presumes to interpret "the will of God" to every citizen, what is left for the Church. Its separation from the state is only an empty echo and possesses no meaning whatever.

There seems to be one quite definite course open to all freedom-loving American citizens, and that is to resist this outraging of our consciences by inaugurating a campaign of opposition by Passive Resistance methods including persuasion, education, publication and broadcast of information by every available means. Never in the history of our country did ever a group or body of citizens have a more worthy principle for which to contend, and, if necessary, to sacrifice.

The churches of America have already properly inaugurated this campaign by official action of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America in their recent conference in Indianapolis, at which they have issued the following important statement to their constituent bodies, including more than thirty leading denominations:—

FEDERAL COUNCIL'S ATTITUDE ON WAR.

We believe that war is contrary to the spirit of Christ and incompatible with the gospel of love and brotherhood which we profess. It is the most colossal and ruinous social sin that afflicts humanity. The methods used and the passions aroused by war outrage Christ's conception of a kingdom of God in which men shall trust, love, forgive, and help one another. We see in war's cruelties, made more terrible and devastating by modern scientific progress, not only a menace to civilization, but also a repudiation of the Prince of Peace.

We hold that the agencies of our churches should never again be used in preparation for war, but should be used in the promotion of peace. The church of Christ, as an institution, should not become an instrument for the fostering of international suspicion and hatred. It should not sanction war nor bless it. To support war is to deny the gospel which we profess to believe.

God alone is Lord of the conscience. We hold, therefore, that citizenship should not be conditioned upon the willingness to bear arms, contrary to conscience, or to take part as a war combatant, in contradiction to moral convictions. We believe that to base citizenship upon such a test is not only unjust to the individual, but contrary to public welfare and in conflict with the ideals of a nation into whose very structure the principle of political and religious liberty has been built. Our country needs citizens who unswervingly follow the dictates of conscience, making allegiance to God the supreme guide to life and conduct. Since sixty-two nations have, in the Pact of Paris, renounced war and pledged themselves to seek only the methods of peace in the settlement of their controversies, applicants for citizenship should not be required to make pledges that conflict with the spirit and intent of this Pact. We recommend such changes in the present laws that citizenship shall not be conditional upon willingness to bear arms. Civilian educational institutions should not make military instruction compulsory.

Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, in his personal appeal for a "Christian Conscience About War" which he made before the League of Nations Assembly service at the Cathedral at Geneva, September 3, 1925, said:

Speaking from this historic Christian pulpit to Christians of many races and nations gathered here, one finds himself inevitably concerned with that matter—addressing as it were the conscience of Christendom about war. The destinies of humankind depend upon the arousing of that conscience. Here in Geneva you once more are setting your minds to the high task of working out the technique of international co-operation. In this sanctuary we set ourselves this morning to consider the dynamic without which all technique will fail—the conscience

Doubtless we represent here many different kinds of Christianity. We belong to different churches, hold various theories about ecclesiastical polity, subscribe to diverse creeds. But one thing does unite us all. We all start with and include the Master himself. To all of us He is the Lord and His way is the way of life . . . It has been said again and again that if another war befalls us and shakes civilization to its foundations, as it surely would, the Christians of the world will be to blame. Surely that is true. The continuance of war will advertise that 576,000,000 professed Christians on earth have not had an earnest conscience about their Master's view of life; it will be evidence that while they have called him "Lord, Lord," they have not been willing to do what he said. . . .

The old appeals for war in the name of a good cause fall coldly now on the instructed ear and cease to carry conviction to thoughtful minds. "Would you not go to war to protect the weak?" men ask. The answer seem obvious. A modern war to protect the weak?—that is a grim jest. See how modern war protests the weak: 10,000,000 known dead soldiers; 3,000,000 dead civilians, 20,000,000 wounded; 3,000,000 prisoners; 9,000,000 war orphans, 5,000,000 war widows; 10,000,000 refugees. What can we mean—modern war protecting the weak? The conviction grows clear in the multitudes of minds that modern war is no way to protect the weak. A World Court could protect the weak. An international mind, backed by a Christian conscience that would stop the race for armaments, provide co-operative substitutes for violence, forbid the nations to resort to force, and finally outlaw war altogether—that would protect the weak. But this is clear; war will not do it. It is the weak by millions that perish in every war.

So it becomes increasingly clear that thoughtful citizens in general and Christian citizens in particular are encountering serious difficulty in trying to reconcile their conscience to the growing radical type of nationalism which seems determined to raise its power above man's conscience.

In his discussion of this subject Sherwood Eddy, in Abolition of War, pp. 93-94, proceeds to raise a series of practical present-day questions which makes it applicable to any situation in which the individual may find himself to-day. He asks :

If the Kaiser calls a German Christian to fight for the Fatherland and the latter, after having thought the whole question through deliberately and conscientiously, cannot do so without violating his conscience, is he under moral obligations to obey the Kaiser, which is the German word for Caesar, or obey the Christ?

If the commander who sunk the Lusitania is under orders from the Kaiser and Admiral Tirpitz to sink the ship, but hears the still, small voice of conscience telling him to save the women and children, is he under moral obligation to obey Caesar or Christ?

If the Czar, which is the Russian name for Caesar, should call you to serve with the fifteen millions of Russians in the last war would you be under moral obligation to obey Christ or Caesar, God or man, the state or the enlightened Christian conscience?

If you had lived at the time of the Mexican war, which was condemned by Lincoln, Grant and others, and you had believed it to be unjust, would you have been disloyal if you had spoken out against the war, or is the state absolute and supreme in war and peace?

If Fall, who while Secretary of the Interior, seemed most anxious to have us go down and "clean up Mexico," had succeeded in his aims, with Daugherty, Doheny, Sinclair and the yellow press in full cry, would you be under obligations to obey the state or your Christian conscience in such an event? Or would you deem that the question should be left to the World Court, or League of Nations, or to the Hague Tribunal, or other method of arbitration? Would you say that any power that insisted on violence and refused arbitration was in the wrong in its methods, whether my country or another? Or, let us suppose a war for a righteous end, in a cause similar to that of the last war. If you believe that warfare between modern nations is wrong in its methods and in its result and that it is unchristian, which would you count supreme on the moral issue, the state or the autonomous Christian conscience?

He then concludes by answering his own question thus :

The exact line of demarcation between the right of the state and the right of the individual in matters of conscience has not been clearly defined and established in law. But I hold to my ultimate moral right to refuse conscription on a fundamental moral issue. I believe in an adequate police force, municipal, national, and, with adequate safeguards, international. I would make full provision for the state, and the protection of life and property. I would render to Caesar, in the duty of good citizenship, the things that are Caesar's. But I would render to God the things that are God's; and nothing is more his than the moral sphere of the conscience. If the secular government is supreme here we have displaced God from the holy of holies of religion and have enthroned instead the idolatry of the state.

For myself, I believe in liberty of conscience, on a moral issue. If ten men are called to the colours and nine feel they should go, I believe they should follow their conscience. If the tenth feels that he can no more commit what to him is public murder than he could private homicide, I believe that he, too, as well as the other nine, should follow his conscience. I believe he should say, "I love my country and will gladly give my life for it in the only way which I believe is effective. . . . I am ready to die, but not to kill; to take up the cross but not the sword." With Luther I say, "I neither can nor will retract anything; for it cannot be right for a Christian man to speak against his conscience. . . . Here I stand. I can do not other. God help me."

The United States government admitted the principle of the genuine conscientious objector in the First World War and exempted from combatant service Quakers, Dunkers, Mennonites, and members of other churches which are officially committed against war. Great Britain admitted the principle by establishing special courts to examine individual conscientious objectors and sift them out from slackers and cowards. These were administered scandalously but the principle was affirmed legislatively. Perhaps a refusal to engage in war will seem to some to-day as impractical, as unpatriotic and as disloyal as the stand taken by Jesus and his followers for the first three centuries seemed to the Roman state and to the Jewish church.

If thou release this man thou art not Caesar's friend. We have no king but Ceasar. Crucify him.

So cried even the religious people of His day, and so many of them may cry again when the final issue comes between war and conscience.

During the First World War a few hundred genuine conscientious objectors went to prison for their faith. It was only fair to expect that in view of a more enlightened conscience the Second World War would see not a few hundred, but many thousands who would prefer to go to prison rather than take any destructive part in what they believe, with the Federal Council of Churches, "is the world's chief collective sin."

"CONCHIES"

CLEARING UP SOME MISCONCEPTIONS

By Arthur Deeson.

(The following is the conclusion of this article inadvertently omitted from page 134.)

Summing up and once again writing from personal experience I find many of my C.O. friends and acquaintances come into the category of "passive pacifists." They are decent, thinking, fellows, who have decided war is wrong but have done little about it. Before the war they signed the pledge, and left it at that. Probably, after the war, they will return to their jobs. During the period of hostilities they are making the best of a bad one. They do their work, cheerfully and with good will, they work hard, but at the back of their minds is a secret glow and they are only waiting for the day they will be able to return to their quiet and harmonious studies and careers.

Then there is the minority, the inspired C.O., the out and out idealists who is also practical. He is grimly determined to make a new and better world and is ready to sacrifice his whole life to this end, his battle will never cease. David of this community is a typical example. He is twenty-eight, a grave and thoughtful young man. The son of a Wesleyan minister, he is a M.A., and a LL.B., and before the war was an up and coming solicitor in Scotland. Now, in his quiet and undramatic way, he has decided he will put all this aside and devote himself to social service. When I questioned he said simply : "I think I can be more help that way."

Did I say C.O.s like that were in the minority? On second thoughts I'm not so sure. In this community there are twelve men, three women. Seven of the men and one woman went to social service for a considerable post-war period. Is this at all typical of pacifists?

Lastly I am convinced that much of the dislike of pacifists arises from sheer ignorance.

It is very easy for a war widow or a bereft mother to curse the unknown pacifist who lives in "safety" whilst her son or husband has died defending his country. People who have known Germans, who have lived amongst them, counted them as friends, cannot hate with such blind unreasoning brutality as those who only know of the race through the newspaper, radio and screen. Similiarly with the pacifists. If only the widow, the bereaved mother, knew some C.O.s personally they might be surprised to find that they are in the main, as sincere as their own husband or son who went off to fight.

It is part of our job here to deliver goods to various schools. Whenever we visit a school for the first time the kitchen staff invariably knows we are "conchies" and invariably our reception is cold and even hostile. But after a few visits, when they have found us to be normal people, perhaps a little more polite and helpful than the average delivery man, they slowly come round. I venture to say we are even popular, for at almost every kitchen we are now offered tea and cake, and as we do not like to refuse their generous gestures, we are often hard pressed towards the end of a circuit.

THE NEW JERUSALEM

By M. CHERRY

In the land of the New Jerusalem the Peoples were free.

Sickened of the crudities of politicians, they had cast off the yoke of National Governments, and formed a Universal Commonwealth of all the Peoples of the Earth.

You see, they were so very well equipped morally for this stupendous change, for when the governments, just before their total eclipse, had conscripted practically every man, woman and child in the world, they had armed them with the weapons of warfare, so that the Peoples had practically all the bloody weapons of warfare in their hands. And what, you may ask, did they do with them?

Well, I'll tell you—they simply threw them into the sea, and such a big splash did they make as to cause a wave so high that its foam actually washed the skies, but just before this the Peoples had confiscated all the executive powers from the governments, particularly in regard to money, and goods.

What a good idea, I can hear you exclaim! But what, you ask, did the Peoples do with the money and goods they had taken from the governments?

Well, so as to prevent the poor people being taken into slavery by the old-fashioned regulations of daily toil and so forth, they divided up the money and goods among the poor, so as to give them sufficient capital to make them independent, which enabled them to become properly equipped for whatever form of work they chose to take up.

Splendid, wasn't it! But now you want to know what the People did about the governments?

Ah! Now I come to the cream of the story, for the Peoples put every man-jack of the governments' crowds upon an old age pension of ten shillings a week.

Gosh, what a good idea! I can hear you exclaim.

Yes, indeed, it was a jolly good idea, for you see, up to this time the governments had never used their brains, for nobody with brains could have got the world into the mess they had. But now they were compelled to use their brains, or what there was left of them, trying to think how to make two ends meet. In fact, so busy were they conjuring with the problem of ways and means, that it kept them out of mischief for the rest of their days.

Then GOD BE PRAISED, we all cry.

MURDER WILL OUT

A STUDY

This is a story that has nothing to do with the war. It deals with no war except the social war. It is a story of peace-time struggle and suffering. It is the story of Police-Captain Schaack, Anarchist-baiter; the story of a period when people conceived of Anarchists as the only bomb throwers and did not vision, as something normal, the wholesale destruction of civilisation by huge bombs dropped from the skies to express the organised destructive proclivities of government.

The story was recalled nine years ago by the memorial service held at the Bricklayers' Hall, West Monroe Street, Chicago, on the afternoon of Sunday, April 12, 1936, for Nina Spies, the good comrade rather than widow of August Spies, who was hanged on November 11, 1887, for championing the cause of the Eight-Hour Day.

The Chicago Anarchists were good trade unionists rather than Anarchists. Their gospel was Syndicalism or Industrial Unionism. But each had a personal idealism, and a flair for the libertarian struggle, a concept of freedom and breadth of vision that ranked him as an Anarchist by temperament and in conduct. In doctrine, they were reformists and not revolutionists.

Nina Spies died on Thursday, April 9, 1936, after a life devoted to the labour movement and the exoneration of the men who were hanged on November 11, 1887, for the Haymarket Protest Meeting. Shortly before her death she asked the Industrial Workers of the World, which she had always considered as carrying on the splendid traditions of the Haymarket Martyrs, to arrange for her burial. In accordance with this wish, and knowing well her wide sympathy with all phases of the labour movement, the I.W.W. invited all labour organisations to participate in the Memorial Service. She was buried near Spies and his comrades, in Waldheim Cemetery, Monday, April 13. Her age was 74.

The speakers at the memorial service included:

Lucy Parsons, widow of Albert R. Parsons, the most outstanding and idealistic of the Haymarket Martyrs, who refused to save his life. Lucy Parsons wrote a life of Albert R. Parsons and a history of the Labour Movement in America that merits reprinting and wide circulation to-day, as a message, an inspiration, and a warning.

Frank Cedervall, of the I.W.W.

Walker F. Alderton, Professor of Social Pathology, Chicago Theological Seminary.

Dr. Ben. Reitman, Nina Spies' friend and physcian, the sometime friend of Emma Goldman and outspoken U.S. "Hobo" leader. At the time of this meeting, Ben Reitman, who had been tarred and feathered and jailed for his views in San Diego, Cal., was a most respectable member of society and the author of some expensive but wide-selling books on pathology.

Al Goldman, of the Socialist Party.

Arthur Hopkins, of the Young Recruit, I.W.W. Youth Organ.

D. W. Dwyer, of the James Connolly Club.

Irving S. Abrams, of the Free Society Group.

Vera Busch, of the Communist League of Struggle.

Other speakers were Schoenfeld, an eye-witness to the Haymarket Tragedy; Helen Gaul, of the Plebian Forum; Dan Horsley and Fred W. Thompson, of the I.W.W. After the memorial service, which was well attended, the entire body paraded to the undertaking parlour.

The story of Nina Van Zandt Spies is a tragic romance of the Labour Movement in the United States on its highest plane of struggle and devotion. It merits telling and re-telling till the world is free and mankind lives in joy and the contentment of mutual service.

Nina Van Zandt was a young well-to-do graduate of Vassar in 1886 when August Spies, Albert R. Parsons, George Engel, Louis Lingg, Oscar Neebe, Samuel Fielden, Adolf Fischer and Michael Schwab were charged with conspiracy to murder and held in the old Cook County jail with hundreds of their friends. They were there because they had called a protest meeting in the old Haymarket Square, on Randolph, near Desplains, over the action of the police in shooting pickets at the McCormick Reaper works. It was an orderly meeting, with Mayor Carter H. Harrison present. Shortly before it was due to adjourn a sprinkle of rain began to fall. The police attacked the meeting. Someone threw a bomb, and the Haymarket Martyrs, those who had arranged for or spoken at the meeting, were charged with conspiracy to murder on the ridiculous legal contortion that if they had not called the meeting the police would not have been there to get killed.

Nina Van Zandt's mother was the welfare worker in the jail. Her father was a wealthy chemist in Philadelphia. She got interested in the men and was surprised to find them vastly different from the loathsome descriptions given in the daily press. In particular, she was interested in the fiery young German editor, August Spies. Collaborating with him she produced his memorable Autobiography. Impressed with his ideals, she astonished the world by marrying him shortly before he was hanged. The marriage was merely a ceremony of loyalty and a challenge to false society. It was a pure mating of the spirit. And it inspired Nina Van Zandt for the rest of her life. It was a magnificent gesture of loyalty to the condemned.

Throughout the years Nina carried on the unfinished business of August Spies and his fellow-workers in the quest for more justice, more freedom, and more of the good things of life for the working class. Like Lucy Parsons, who helped found the I.W.W. in 1905, much of her effort was given through the wobblies, although, since she was not a wage worker, she was denied the membership she craved.

Nina Spies often said that it was not merely because the I.W.W. made its annual pilgrimage to Waldheim and honoured the Haymarket eight-hours fighters every May and November, that she loved the I.W.W.. To her mind, it was the one organisation that was attempting to complete the splendid work for which the Chicago martyrs gave their life.

October 9, 1935, she wrote:

"Dear Comrade Velsek: Your kind and cordial invitation to speak at the Memorial Meeting for the Martyrs on November 10th has been accepted by me with great pleasure. It really touched my heart, because I always considered the I.W.W. as my own organisation. Life is uncertain. I never quite realised how much so until now. I narrowly escaped being burned alive in a bus accident coming from Toledo last Friday night. This made me remember that I promised my remains to the I.W.W. when I die . . . I shall write a definite outline of what the comrades to do after I 'pass out.' Please just note that I desire you, good people to bury me in Waldheim Cemetery. This is all for the present. I hope to live to add my bit to the Memorial Meeting.

"Cordially and fraternally yours—

NINA SPIES."

She added her bit at the memorial meeting, not knowing that this would be the last memorial meeting she would address. Yet she spoke with more power than she had spoken at previous meetings, although she spoke with power and sincerity always. Perhaps she sensed that this would be her last public tribute. Yet, well as she spoke, even Nina Spies did not know the full story of police villainy.

As stated, Nina Spies was buried at Waldheim. The funeral procession left the Beaumont Undertaking Parlours and went by way of the scene of the old Haymarket Square, where all stopped in silent tribute to the martyrs of the 1886 meeting, and then went on to Waldheim. A short ceremony was held at the grave with Ralph Chaplin and Irving Abrams speaking.

Foremost in defending what has been termed "loranorder" as distinct from law and order, in baiting the Anarchists of Chicago in 1886; foremost in responsibility for the Haymarket tragedy of that year and the Anarchist executions of November, 1887, was Police-Captain Schaack who used his official position for hounding radicals, and lent his name to a voluminous work "exposing" Anarchism throughout the world, and labelling the Anarchists of the United States as Public Enemies of the people. The disappearance and murder of Dr. Cronin, three years after the Haymarket bomb-throwing, and two years after the Anarchist executions, put Captain Schaack in a new and sinister light. It exposed his criminal corruption and that of the Police Department over which he presided. Yet the Anarchists, themselves, failed to link up the factual indictment with the man's 1886-87 conspiracies. To our mind, a strange failure.

Mr. Conklin, a prosperous saloon-keeper, lived on North Clark Street, Chicago, in 1889. With him and his wife, then resided Dr. Cronin, who was a very dear friend of the family.

"It's a case of life and death," pleaded the messenger who called at the Conklin residence on the peaceful evening of May 3, 1889. Against the wishes of Mrs. Conklin, the doctor responded to the plea. He stepped into a weather-beaten buggy, drawn by a mangy white horse—never to be seen alive again.

Then began a most extraordinary investigation. The police department of the great middle-west city, that had conspired to murder innocent working-men two years before, again conspired to strangle truth. Insiduous police-forces, bar-room politics, secret societies, sought to block a dastardly crime from being solved. Where was the point of murdering Anarchists, if crime could not stalk the city, clothed in the garments of respectable politics, protected by business interests, and even flaunting the policeman's badge?

Just as the Chicago Police Department had discovered the Anarchist to be criminals and assassins, so it now laboured to prove that Dr. Cronin led a Jekyll-and-Hyde existence, and had been compelled to disappear. Mrs. Conklin answered the police suggestions with vigour. "Let them keep dragging their red herrings," she told a reporter. "Murder will out!"

And so it proved!

On May 17, two tots of four, a boy and a girl, were playing on the walk near the corner of Evanstoun Avenue and Fifty-Ninth Street. The girl was teaching the boy how to play Jacks, by way of consoling him for breaking his hoop. Teasing her, he picked up the small solid-rubber ball, and tried "to bounce it to the sky." The ball bounced along Evanstoun Avenue to the corner and disappeared. The children concluded that it had rolled into the vent that served as an inlet to the city sewer system at that point. The boy, belly-flopping, peered down into the murky depths.

"P'ew, dat smell awful," he told his companion. The child gave up all idea of recovering the ball. That night they informed their parents of the stench that arose from the sewer-opening at the corner of Evanstoun and Fifty-ninth. Next day the neighbours knew.

The weather grew warmer and the terrific complaint of the city. On May 22nd, the City Public Works Department directed a trio of neighbours to investigate. The smell was so nauseating that they were forced to take turns at the job of excavating. Shortly before quitting time, John Finnegan made a discovery with his shovel. "My God! Look at this!" he cried. "There's a body in here, sure enough; its enormous, the body of a giant."

Murder was out!

The corpse was the earthly remains of Dr. Cronin, swollen to twice its normal size, through seventeen-days immersion in waste-water, utterly nude, and horribly mutilated. Around the neck a towel had been knotted tightly. Hanging from it was a Catholic emblem, an Agnus Dei.

The corpse was that of a Catholic, and most likely the murderer or murderers were Catholics also. The head had seven hack wounds, from one to several inches long. And the torso had several smaller wounds. Police-surgeons, who performed the autopsy at the City Morgue, decided that an axe had been used on the head and a chisel on the body.

Mrs. Conklin and Dr. Cronin's brother identified the remains. Murder was out and Dr. Cronin had led no Jekyll-and-Hyde existence. The corpse had once been Dr. Cronin. Why had the police department lied?

An answer to that question was to be found by James Clancy, who had taken part in the Irish uprising of 1867, and had been jailed by the British Government for complicity. In America he had made good as a distinguished reporter, and was sent to Chicago from New York by the Herald, to get to the bottom of things.

Clancy knew that Doctor Cronin had opposed Alexander Sullivan in the Clan-na-Gael. The doctor had maintained that Sullivan had made patriotism his profession, sucking the life-blood of the Clan. The murderd man clearly had intended to depose Sullivan from his racketeering leadership, and had planned to attend the coming Convention for this purpose. Cronin had said of Sullivan: "That man has no more blood than a fish, and would not hesitate to take my life."

Feeling that he had the clue to the murder, Clancy, on reaching Chicago, went directly to Lake View, for an audience with Pat O'Sullivan, the ice-dealer with a political pull. Clancy accused O'Sullivan of being a party to the murder and published his interviews. The result was that State-Attorney Joel M. Longenecker summoned O'Sullivan to appear at his office. The ice-dealer found Captain Wing, of the Lake View Station, and Captain Schnettler, from Headquarters, there also.

In the Conklins' flat there had been discovered an advertising card, with the pen-and-ink drawing of a team of horses hitched to an ice-wagon, different from the business cards ordinarily distributed in the interests of the O'Sullivan Ice Company. O'Sullivan was was asked to explain, and recalled a queer occurrence.

Across the street from his own home, on Ashland Avenue, Lake View, was the Carlson Cottage. Two young men had rented this cottage in March, and had moved in some cheap furniture.

"They told the landlady they had jobs with me, which they didn't. Maybe, it was one of them that gave the card to Cronin."

It will never be known why O'Sullivan told this story. The police-officers hurried out to the two-storeyed gabled cottage. Twin splotches of blood greeted them on the pathway. Other, once-crimson stains could be seen on the steps. They bashed in the door, and within a pregnant scene met their eyes. Bloodstains had changed completely the original design of the wall-paper, and great chunks of plaster had been dislodged from the wall. A rocking-chair was upturned, with the right-arm broken off: and here there was more blood. All evidence of a terriffic struggle.

"Looks like a slaughter-house," commented Captain Schnettler.

Upstairs, Captain Wing discovered a small flat key, which was found subsequently to fit the lock of the trunk which had been found in the ditch skirting Evanstoun Avenue. The back of a dressing-case had a dealer's name: A. R. Revell & Company, Chicago, furniture dealers.

This very conservative firm kept elaborate and complete records. The furniture had been sold on February 17 by W. T. Hatfield, to J. B. Simonds. He was able to describe the purchaser.

Mrs. Carlson, the landlady of the cottage, also described her tenant. He had paid the first month's rent of 12 dollars in advance. He had given her the name of Frank Williams, not Simonds. This was on March 20th.

Her husband stated that "Williams," after completing the negotiations, had walked across the street, where he encountered O'Sullivan.

"Well, it's rented," Carlson overheard "Williams" tell the ice-dealer.

Later, O'Sullivan acknowledged that he knew the young man. "I'll pay the next month's rent" O'Sullivan promised, "if Williams fails to—ah—show up."

William Mestes, a milkman, stepped forward and declared that, on the night of Dr. Cronin's murder, he was in the neighbourhood of Ashland Avenue about 9 o'clock. He saw the buggy, in which two were seated, drive up to the door of the cottage. He described how the door was opened, and also the horse, a light sorrel, with a white-face. Before going away, Mestes heard loud, angry cries coming from the cottage.

Mrs. Pauline Hoertle, a German washerwoman, was in the neighbourhood of Ashland Avenue, at the time that Dr. Cronin went into the cottage with his bag. She described his arrival, saw him enter, and heard him cry: "Oh! God." She heard the thud of many blows, a heavy fall, and an agonized cry: "Jesus!"

This evidence enabled the police to reconstruct the murder of Dr. Cronin. Evidently he had battled against odds and had been attacked with an ice-man's hatchet. Pat O'Sullivan was implicated. Although the investigation had got so far, it was half-hearted. And the Department wanted to arrest further enquiry.

Mrs. Conklin again demanded to be heard. She asked for all the white horses in Chicago to be paraded, and she offered to point out the one that drove Dr. Cronin to his doom!

Mrs. Conklin's demand carried headlines in the papers. Patrick Dinan, livery stable-keeper, saw them and headed for the Chicago Avenue Station House. Detective Daniel Coughlin met him on the steps and exclaimed:—

Don't go off the handle, Pat. It'll only get me in trouble, maybe you, too. Let it wait, and I'll see you to-night, as soon as I'm off duty.

Dinan retraced his footsteps, but the detective failed to find him at home that night. Patrick Dinan was closeted with Captain Schaack at the latter's home.

The police captain learned that Coughlin had stopped at the livery stable to tell Dinan that a friend of his would call for a rig that night; that he should give it to the man and forget the incident afterwards. Coughlin had promised to be responsible for the horse and buggy's safe return.

Later, a man who gave the name of Thomas Smith turned up, but protested when he saw the horse was white. He wanted an animal that would be less conspicuous. Dinan told him the white horse was all he had left; spooners had taken their pick of the crop earlier that balmy spring evening.

Cursing, the man took his leave. He returned at 9.26, and Dinan complained that the horse was nearly exhausted and had been abused. "Smith" told the liveryman to cry on "Coughlin's shoulder."

Mrs. Conklin, reading about Dinan's white horse, pinned her ostrich-plumed hat to her pompadoured hair, and set forth for Patrick Dinan's livery-stable. She readily identified the nag as being the one which drew the death-buggy.

Captain Schaack refused to act. He covered Detective Coughlin in every way and accepted his explanations, even eulogising Coughlin to the newspaper reporters. Mrs. Conklin declined to accept Schaack's decision, and persuaded John Cronin to swear out an information on May 27, charging O'Sullivan, Coughlin, and others unknown, with the murder of Dr. Cronin. The newspapers were apprised and the warrants issued. The ice-dealer and detective were arrested that day and indicted by the Grand Jury on the following day.

The Coroner's inquest opened and held daily sessions till June 12. At its conclusion, O'Sullivan and Coughlin were held for murder, and the arrest was ordered of Alexander Sullivan.

The evidence at the Coroner's Court showed that Sullivan was born in Canada, the son of an English soldier. He crossed the border and as a young man, opened a shoe shop in Detroit. Here he married Margaret Buchanan, a teacher in the public schools. The couple moved to Chicago, when his wife secured a newspaper position as an editorial writer, and Sullivan obtained a job in the Public Works Department. At night he studied law, and was admitted finally to the Bar.

In 1876, Sullivan was charged with the murder of a school-teacher, Mrs. Francis Hanford, but was acquitted.

After this, Sullivan became a power in the Clan-na-Gael, where his authority was challenged by a vigorous minority, headed by Dr. Cronin. Sullivan was chosen President of the Irish Land League of America.

It was proved, in the evidence sifted by the Coroner, that, in 1892, Sullivan had deposited one hundred thousand dollars in currency in the Continental Bank in New York. This deposit was recorded following the leader's return from Paris France (not U.S.A), where he was charged with having blackjacked Patrick Egan, treasurer of the Irish Land League, of the money, threatening—if refused—that he would "burst open every Clan-na-Gael camp in America." Brokers' records proved that Sullivan had lost this money in speculation.

Further testimony showed that Sullivan was on most amicable understanding terms with Le Caron, the notorious British secret agent, and that the two conspired to place Irish patriots in British dungeons. Dr. Cronin had documentary evidence of Sullivan's treachery and had predicted his own death if he succeeded in checking the realisation of Sullivan's ambition to rule Irish-American affairs. But Sullivan was a big man in Chicago, and it was difficult to trace his connection with the conspiracy. So he was dismissed from trial. The case against O'Sullivan and Coughlin stood.

Detective John Collins discovered that "Williams" was a member of the Clan-na-Gael, Camp No. 20, and that his name was Martin Burke, alias Delany. He was arrested in Winnipeg on June 16, and after lengthy extradition proceedings, returned to Chicago. "J. B. Simonds" was proved to be Patrick Cooney, but he was never apprehended. After his death, it was learned that he hid in New York all the time.

The trial got under way the last week in August. Judge McConnell presided. Forty-two days were spent in examining 1091 prospective jurors. 927 were "excused for cause." Several admitted that they had been offered 1,000 dollars each to go on the jury and vote acquittal. On October 25, five months and three weeks after the murder of Dr. Cronin, State-Attorney Joel M. Longenecker opened the case for the prosecution. He said, in part:—

"The word had been passed that Doctor Cronin was a spy, and that he would soon appear across the water as another Le Caron. It was possible that the actual murderers were led to their work by this belief. It was certain, at least, that the dastardly attempt had been made by the hidden hand to spread the spy theory after the Doctor disappeared. Men had been told to do such acts as would lead the public to believe that the physician was still alive, and so successful had they been that only by mere accident was it that their plans were revealed, and they were caught and shown in their true colours."

On November 16, the State closed its case. None of the defendants entered the witness-box to deny the charge. For each accused had someone come forward to plead an alibi.

Detective Michael Whalen swore that he saw Detective Coughlin at the Chicago Avenue Station-House from 7.30 until 12 o'clock on the night of the murder.

Mulcahey took oath that he had been in O'Sullivan's company all of that fateful night.

Martin Burke had to have his alibi as well. A saloon-keeper, Matt Danaghy, asserted the defendant had shaken dice with him during the time that Doctor Cronin was being hacked to death.

The Defence even provided an alibi for the famous white horse! A witness, imported from Hoboken, New Jersey, who gave the name of Louis Budenbender, testified that he witnessed the departure of Doctor Cronin from the Conklin flat, but that it couldn't have been Dinan's white horse, for the horse was a dark, speckled gray.

Perjury? Let the reader judge for himself.

The Defence rested on November 25th.

The jury members locked horns for 70 hours before the foreman announced their arrival at a verdict. This was December 16th, 1889.

John F. Beggs, head-man of Camp No. 20 of the Clan-na-Gael was acquitted. John Kunze, who drove Detective Coughlin to the sinister cottage, was sentenced to three years' penal servitude for manslaughter. Coughlin, O'Sullivan and Burke were found guilty of murder and were sentenced to life imprisonment.

So, in spite of crooked politics, falsified testimony, a law enforcement corps, at least, partially dishonest and dishonourable, the mystery of Chicago's vanishing doctor was solved.

In conclusion, no words could be more fitting than an extract from the statement of the Honourable Luther Laffin Mills, associate counsel for the State.

"The plot was the most damnable and hellish that has ever been concocted to defeat the ends of justice. It cannot be exaggerated. It extends all over the country, and its ramifications are so numerous and far-reaching that it seems incredible that we have made such progress in marking them out. This miserable effort to befoul the laws of Illinois is without parallel in the history of legal jurisprudence. When all the facts are known, as they are sure to be, sooner or later, the whole civilised world will be shocked—as it was when the news of the conspiracy that ended in Doctor Cronin's death was sent out."

And the police of Chicago who entered heart and soul into the plot, Captain Schaack who tried so hard to cover up the murderers, sent innocent men to their death because they were Anarchists!

SOME COMMENTS ON THE GERMAN SURRENDER

By C. H. Norman.

It is clear from unanimous reports on the condition of the larger German towns that the methods of barbarism, as illustrated by unrestricted, concentrated area bombing, have been the main element in forcing a German capitulation. The Germans knew, with the fine weather of summer, the terrible attacks of the autumn and winter by the Anglo-American Air Forces were to be much increased in volume. The enormous Russian tanks were a great element counting in the success on the Eastern front, coupled with the prodigal sacrifice of Russian lives which the German generals were not willing to emulate, whatever the Nazi Government may have desired. Reuter's Berlin correspondent, as recorded in Evening Standard, May 10, declared that the Russian losses had been "between 12,000,000 and 15,000,000 dead, of whom about half were soldiers and half civilians. There were times, said a Russian general, when we had to lose 500,000 men at a time to save the army itself." These are rather crptic utterances; but they are confirmed by Stalin's own assertion that the main contribution of Russia to the war had been "blood."

There were other considerations, however, which influenced the German High Command and the Nazi leaders. The invasion of Germany had been more extensive than was anticipated, as the low-flying and terror-bombing attacks could not be easily met after the loss of German supplies of oil and the consequent contraction of their air force operations. The effect of this invasion coming in the sowing season was serious on the possibility of getting the ground cultivated in time for next season's harvest. Secondly, the food situation in Germany itself, owing to the bombing of the food stores, had become so critical that there were only two months' food supplies in Germany on May 8th. There was no chance of getting in food from outside while the European war continued. The only thing to do was to capitulate in such a form that the responsibility for feeding the German population would be thrown on the four occupying Powers. The water supplies of the towns had been so ruthlessly and deliberately bombed that there was a general shortage of pure water threatening even in the most well-watered districts, with the possibility of typhoid epidemics breaking out generally.

A second element was the currency question. The division of Germany by the invading armies had created an extremely difficult situation for the German financial controllers, who were faced with an almost complete collapse of the mark in the next few weeks. The occupation of Germany by the Allies will also necessitate the Allies using their resources to keep up a stable currency, otherwise the position of even the occupying armies would become almost impossible. Whether the Allies will be able to maintain a quadruple military government of Germany on the principles which have been laid down without producing a general economic catastrophe in Europe may be open to doubt. Like it or not, the fact is that Germany was the centre of the economic life of Western Continental Europe. The kind of occupation of Germany which has been foreshadowed is something without precedent in history. It is much worse in its moral and economic consequences than Germany imposed on the countries occupied by her armies, as the central structure of those countries was left in the hands of the native populations. The defeated countries, France and Poland, were treated rather differently; but the terms imposed on France were light and generous compared with those being dictated to Germany by the Allies.

The economic character of the war is clearly revealed already. Russian Imperialism has completely swallowed the pretence of Communism, which has entirely disappeared since Lenin's death, leaving the Russian system as an exploitation of the masses by the State, with such little improvement in their lot that the last return of the International Wholesale Co-operative movement put Russia fourth from the bottom in the standard of life of the countries of the world; while under the Czars her position was about midway. Stalin is also busily carrying out the proposals set forth in that curious Russian political programme known as the Will of Peter the Great. The independence of the following states is gone apparently for the time: Persia, Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Bulgaria, Rumania, and Hungary. The independence of Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, and Yugo-Slavia is extremely dubious, but certainly those states are overshadowed by the Russians. The position of Turkey and Austria is hardly any better; while it has been announced that the Russians intend to retain the part of Northern Norway which is in their occupation. The moral of this state of things may strike different minds in different ways; but it is worth remembering that the two features of the Nazi rule most disliked in England; the ruthless suppression of opposition by concentration camps and other cruel methods; and the presentation of only one side of any matter were borrowed from Russian "Communism," and are still in active operation in that country, which has pressed its ruthlessness to the extent of declining to permit any International Red Cross activity on behalf of the Russian prisoners of war in Germany or on behalf of the German prisoners of war in Russia. Stalin regarded all Russian prisoners of war as for the time being people who had lost their Russian nationality by virtue of their surrender, and, therefore, the Russian State had no further responsibility for them. Nothing was permitted to be done by the relatives of Russian prisoners of war in the way of sending parcels of food or clothing to the Russian prisoner of war camps. Many Russian prisoners strayed into Switzerland, which Government set up camps for them and incurred considerable expense on their behalf, with the result that the Russian wireless proceeded to denounce the Swiss camps as of a like to the German concentration camps, which have been the subject of so much comment. Certainly it would seem that the Russian "Communist" Government regards the Russian peasant as cannon fodder to an even greater extent than the old Czarist Government, which did not adopt this kind of policy towards Russian prisoners of war between 1914-1917.

The Left Wing and Labour Movement in this country are faced with the situation that their support of the war, aided by the sacrifices of the Red Army, has made certain the continuation of capitalism in Britain for a long period, unless some world catastrophe should supervene as a result of the war. One may wonder what the working classes of Britain will think when this fact, for fact it is, strikes their dull intelligence. It is surely plain that there is no hope of dislodging capitalism in Britain by supporting the capitalist class in the wars which it has continually plunged the country into in order to save itself and secure a further lease of life. The Boer War, the War of 1914-1918, the European War of 1939-1945, and the War against Japan are wars of this category: partly to extend the Empire, partly to destroy the trade of rivals, but mainly to keep the capitalist state going by the psychology of national unity and patriotic bunkum.

On the general situation, the following passage from "The Revolutionary Spirit in Modern Literature and Drama," published in 1937, represents the state of the European and Anglo-American mind: "The brutal and cowardly nature of the military trade is testified by these leading examples of the treachery of the military mind," referring to cited examples from many countries: "Nor is there any improvement to be seen in the latest addition to the military arm. What more bestial occupation can be conceived than the dropping of bombs on civilian aggregations of men, women and children, who have no means of defence against this cowardly form of attack. People who adopt this trade are surely the most despicable that the human race has yet conceived." These are the kind of people who are now dominating the world. The irony of the situation is that the German people are going to have imposed on them a rigid military rule under which their wireless stations, their newspapers and the education of their children are to be controlled by their enemies, who have conducted the war against Germany by methods of barbarism unparalleled since the days of Tamerlane and Genghis Khan. And are Messrs. Churchill, Truman, Stalin, de Gaulle, Stettinius & Co. fitted to educate anyone in a better way of life? The question has only to be formulated to receive its answer.

Two other points merit immediate reference. It is plain from the statements of German generals that any invasion of Britain was never contemplated, let alone attempted. So another gigantic hoax of the Churchill Government on the British people is revealed. All the effort of the Home Guard and the money spent on that body were sheer waste, due to Mr. Churchill's misplaced sense of humour. One may well wonder whether the thousands of victims of this grim joke will appreciate that kind of humour. What will the Auditor-General, if he does his duty, have to say about this vast expenditure of time and money on a Cabinet hoax?

The second point is that no statement has been issued concerning the terms of the so-called "unconditional surrender." The bulky nature of these documents would seem to require some explanation. It is an interesting fact that the general public (whose concern it is as they are paying the salaries of the persons engaged in these negotiations) is never permitted any information concerning the literal terms of these documents. Even years and years after, no publication is permitted. Are these instruments also gigantic pieces of make-believe, by which the general public are gulled into thinking something great has been effected when, in reality, nothing has been achieved? Publication alone will afford the answer.

CHURCHILL, HITLER, MUSSOLINI

On December 8, 1944, Churchill was reminded in the House of Commons that he had supported Mussolini in 1928. Churchill admitted his support. He declared that he had made speeches to say that it was a very good thing that Italy was not plunged into Bolshevism.

Shinwell asked :—

Where was the righ hon. gentleman's democracy then?

Churchill replied: "Armed violence was being used against democracy by Communists." McGovern commented that Churchill thought that Fascism was better, and Churchill replied :—

Mr. Churchill—I am not a bit afraid of anything I have said in a long political life. (Cheers.) I certainly thought, at that particular time, that the kind of regime set up in Italy at that time was better than a general slump of Italy into the furious Bolshevist civil war which was raging in many other parts of Europe.

Shinwell, who has delivered several Imperialist speeches during the war, has nothing to exclaim about. At one time Shinwell was a member of the Glasgow Anarchist Group, and most active, but found it impossible to last the distance as a revolutionary street-corner orator. Shinwell's career is exposed, in part, an page 62 of Socialism and Parliament, Pt. II. He is in the same category of insincere and worthless parliamentary carcerists as Churchill.

Churchill's remarks were applauded by his Tory henchmen. We hope that none of Labour-collabs cheered his remarks. But they might have done. In any case, his excuse is a lie for Italy was not threatened with a slump into a furious Bolshevist civil war. Also, the civil war in Russia itself was foisted by the Czarist Anti-Socialism intrigues of Winston Churchill. And Churchill's disgraceful alliance with Mussolini made it possible for the sawdust Caesar to boost his empire. It laid the train of the Second World War. Churchill could not have become War Premier in the Second World War but for his own impecunious political past. That record has been paid for by the blood and suffering of the common people of Europe, including Britain itself. The duty of the working class is clear. Despite the pro-war hysterical broadcasts of William Gallacher, M.P., made at the time of Churchill's illness, Churchill should be cast into political oblivion. Dundee did this in 1922 when it returned Morel and Syrymgeous and revealed Churchill as a man who could not accept his Dundee defeat. He has never forgiven Dundee for this rejection. But parliamentarism is only play-acting and mocking the people's struggle with pretence. Dundee rejected Churchill in 1922, and Epping gave him a safe Conservative seat in 1924. Thus elevated, he flirted with the dictators he survived after a world deluge of blood.

Mussolini Charmed Churchill.

Churchill admits his 1928 speeches in defence of Mussolini. But at a Press Conference held in Rome on January 20, 1927, Winston Churchill, as Chancellor of the Exchequer in Baldwin's Cabinet, paid this tribute to Mussolini :—

I could not help being charmed, like so many other people have been, by Signor Mussolini's gentle and simple bearing and by his calm, detached poise in spite of so many burdens and dangers. Secondly, anyone could see that he thought of nothing but the lasting good, as he understood it, of the Italian people, and that no lesser interest was of the slightest consequence to him. If I had been an Italian I am sure that I should have been wholeheartedly with you from the start to finish in your triumphant struggle against the bestial appetites and passions of Leninism. I will, however, say a word on an international aspect of Fascism. Externally your movement has rendered a service to the whole world. The great fear which has always beset every democratic leader or a working class leader has been that of being undermined or overbid by someone more extreme than he. Italy has shown that there is a way of fighting the subversive forces which can rally the masses of the people, properly led, to value and wish to defend the honour and stability of civilised society. She has provided the necessary antidote to the Russian poison. Hereafter no great nation will be unprovided with an ultimate means of protection against the cancerous growth of Bolshevism.

Churchill did not wait until 1927 to express his admiration for Mussolini and his work of Fascist reaction. Churchill was in Florence in October, 1925, when 50 shops were looted, 7 people killed, and a host wounded and bludgeoned by Fascist thugs. The was used against unarmed and disarmed people. There was no Bolshevist civil war in Europe in 1925, and there was no possibility of Italy slumping into Bolshevism.

On July 2, 1921, Mussolini had stated correctly, that :— to say that a Bolshevist peril still exists in Italy was owing to interested motives to substitute fears for reality. Bolshevism had been vanquished.

But in 1925, Churchill, who was aware of this 1921 declaration, and knew its truth, allowed interested Florentine reactionaries to bamboozle him, by treating him as their honoured guest, and taking him to see the looted shops. He expressed his admiration for Fascism!

Churchill and Hitler.

Suppose we leave 1925, 1927, and 1928. On September 3, 1938, Collier's Magazine published an article, entitled "Dictators on Dynamite," by Winston Churchill. It was a study in unconditional tribute to Hitler.

Written in England sometime in July 1938, Churchill's article says of Hitler :—

"Revolted against the crude Marxist catchwords. "Was unmoved by threats of physical violence . . . . He felt himself born to greatness . . . . He was convinced that Socialism and International Jewry were the twin dragons that he, a new Sigfried, was called to combat."

Churchill says that, in the after-war crisis, the modern Siegfried was "an instrument of destiny," who embodied the revolt of Germany against the hard fortune of war, the soul-compelling surge of a warrior nation against defeat, its passion for rehabilitation and revenge . . . The Bolshevik fever threatened to spread beyond the bounds of semi-Asiatic Russia . . . . By a supreme effort, defeated Germany threw it off.

Churchill pictures Hitler as representing this supreme effort of civilisation to throw aside the ravages of Communism or Bolshevism. Thus Churchill built Hitler up and gave him the aid of a foreign political opinion to bolster up the authority of his concentration camps in Germany.

Yet, to-day, the British Tommy, who has won the war, is not permitted to fraternise, if he wishes, with the common people of Germany, because they are responsible for all that Hitler—eulogised and applauded by Churchill—did!

Churchill continues :—

Adolf Hitler is Fuehrer because he exemplifies and enshrines the will of Germany. He is the child of revenge, grief and defeat. He is the embodiment of Teutonic reassertion . . .. He harnessed all prejudices and add difficulties to the wagons of wrath and hate . . . . He broke the paper bonds with which the now chattering and divided Allies sought to restrain this colossus . . . . In five years he has restored Germany to the most powerful position in Europe . . . . He may yet see the day when what is left of Europe will be prostrate at the feet of Germany . . . . Austria has fallen to him without a blow . . . . Here were new resources of men, arms, and money; here were Jews in plenty to maltreat.

Churchill (1938) on Mussolini.

Churchill turns to Mussolini. His enthusiasm knows no bounds. Mussolini, avers Churchill, is not the prisoner, nor the instrument, of forces outside himself. He used the events and circumstances of post-war Italy as he would have used those of any other clime and century.

After the First World War, says Churchill, Italy was in a state of anarchy or chaos. If Anarchists object that chaos is not a true definition of anarchy, let them be comforted. Churchill did not mean merely anarchy but also Leninism. Actually, any and every possible phase of Socialism and social struggle.

In the full tide of his reaction, Churchill described the situation—and Mussolini's triumph—thus :—

Everyyhere one read scrawled upon the wall, "W. Lenin," meaning "Evviva Lenin." Everywhere in the streets and villages Communist bullies murdered their political opponents and terrorised the mass of the population. The workmen seized the factories and tried to work them, not even for the benefit of the community, but as private properties of their own.

The name of Italy was despised by the Italian people. Officers in uniform were insulted whenever they appeared, pulled out of trains and belaboured. The trains themselves ceased to run with any reference to the time-tables. The national flag was spat upon. Then suddenly a few hundred men, taking their lives in their hands, challenged all this squalid and ferocious truculence. The struck back. They entered the streets and confronted the Communists, ready to die and resolute to kill. At the head of this desperate band was Mussolini . . . .

To him patriotism was real; it was a passion in the blood. It had separated him from his Socialist colleagues. It now steeled him to resist this monstrous Bolshevism against which Italian politicians and parties, the police and the armed forces of the crown alike seemed powerless and spineless. In the twinkling of an eye, in a thunderclap, Fascism was born.

Mussolini's appeal to the traditions of ancient Rome proved more potent and compelling than the promise of a Communist Utopia to be secured by killing (!) the landlords, the capitalists and the employers, and having everything managed by officials. He marched to Rome, where the constitutional king, but yesterday the butt of Communist malevolence, welcomed him with tactful and timely confidence. The first Fascist state was born. The world had learned that democracy, taken in the best way at the best moment by the best men, could just as easily be led to the right as to the left.

No reference here to Mussolini's mistress! And note how the first Fascist State, according to Churchill, was conceived by democracy—democracy of the right protesting against the coercion and tyranny of the left!

We make no comment on Churchill's ignorance, appalling ignorance, of the struggle in Italy. But he has remained ignorant ever since, and is as ignorant to-day as when he wrote this eulogy of Mussolini, one year to the month before the outbreak of World War which doomed both Hitler and Mussolini.

Churchill, writing as the democratic apostle of the great man theory, describes how Mussolini's elevation to supreme power

"changed the whole mood and division of the Italian people. All, or almost all, set to work with enthusiasm to build up the greatness of their country. Authority was respected. The flag so lately trampled underfoot was hoisted by ardent and innumerable hands. The trains ran punctually. The factories resumed productions. The peasants tilled their fields with a new vigour and a new hope. Everyone individually felt proud to be an Italian. Nothing like this transformation had even been seen in the secular history of the world.

Benito Mussolini has made modern Italy. Italy is the expression and the instrument of his will."

In the same way, avowed Churchill, Hitler was the expression, the natural and inevitable expression, of Germany.

Churchill's Miracle Men.

Mussolini and Hitler, as late as 1938, were Churchill's two miracle men. He acclaims them for having rescued Europe from Bolshevism, but trusts to their wisdom to act well. Mussolini, he says, is a wise man. And he wrote : " France will love you.".

He describes the sensitiveness of the dictators to the penetrative ideas of democracy and describes thought as being alive in Germany, despite ceaseless Nazi propaganda and parade. The crimes against humanity perpetrated by Mussolini and Hitler at this time left him untouched. He says nothing about the horrible deaths of Socialists in Mussolini's concentration camps, of the murder of Matteotti in 1924, of the war against Ethiopia, of the intervention in Spain. He admits that "the standard of life of the Italian workers may be low," but he eulogises, in contrast, Fascism's new motor highways, new railways, new canals, water-works, and electrical development schemes. He even speaks of Mussolini being trained to be ruler under a democracy.

Churchill believes in Fascism. Mussolini and Hitler had to go, not for their crimes, but because they blocked the path of Churchill's ambitions, and knew not how to play a subsidiary part to High Finance and the British Empire.

Hitler and Mussolini have gone. Let Churchill follow them into oblivion. Only thus will our children be saved from the guns, only thus will motherhood not be called to bear and rear cannon-fodder.

CANADIAN CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY NOTES

By The Rev. R. Edis Fairbairn.

There has recently come into my hands a copy of the Congressional Record of the 78th Congress of the United States. This contains a speech given by Mr. Harry Paxton Howard, newspaper man, at the Community Church Forum, New York City. Hon. William Langer of North Dakota asked permission to have this printed in the Record at private expense. The contents of this document are so startling that one cannot conceive of the U.S. Congress agreeing to publication in the Record unless it knew nothing about them, and the only reason why this would not bring about a new American Revolution would be either because the public would place no credence in it, or, more probably, would never take the trouble to r ead it. Of course the fact that it was printed in the Record implies no Governmental guarantee of accuracy. That stands or falls according as it corresponds with the facts. Mr. Howard appears to document all his assertions. Even so I would not presume to make this digest of the speech if it had not been given to the public in the Record.

Mr. Howard makes two assertions of interest to those who disbelieve in war, and so do not expect any war to live up to its alleged aims, and do expect a post-war understanding of its causes to modify considerably the case originally promoted to justify it.

He affirms that Japan was not an aggressive, imperialistic power until inspired, encouraged, and assisted to become such by Britain and America. He also affirms that the United States Government knew before Pearl Harbour that war would break out, because it had presented an ultimatum to Japan which it knew that country could not accept. These are serious statements which should be challenged if it is possible to do so because when they become generally known they will have grave effects upon the confidence of the people in their rulers. Mr. Howard spent 24 years in the Far East, being deported from Japan because of his sympathy with Japanese labour, and dismissed from the Shanghai China Press by Nazi influence for outspoken editorials on the Reichstag fire. His book, America's Role in Asia, appeared last year.

The subject of the speech was, Britain, Russia, Japan, and America's Role in Asia. Mr. Howard believes with Frances Gunther that World War II is in essence a war to preserve the British Empire. He quotes the New York Daily News as saying—paraphrasing Mr. Churchill, that a proper slogan for Mr. Roosevelt might well be, "I did not become President of the United States to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire." He also quotes two newspapers and the Christian Century in regard to President Roosevelt's statement to a press conference, that after this war it was hoped "there would be no more war for at least the lifetime of this generation," implying doubt that peace would endure for more than a generation, that is, about 25 years! Secretary Knox also puts himself on record as saying:

I am not one of those foolish enough to believe that we can banish war. But I believe we can banish it for a while.

Mr Howard traces the expansion of the British Empire to the east in competition with Russia, and describes how Japan was brought in as a counterweight to Russia. Before 1867 Japan was feudal despotism, but with a remarkably peaceful record, in contrast with that of some European nations. The rise of the monarchy was deliberately fostered and promoted by the British and American Governments for imperial purposes.

In the civil war of 1867-8 the British actively intervened on the side of the monarchists and we followed suit.

Japanese militarism and imperialism was built up, first as a weapon against China, in the hope of estranging and instigating Japanese militarists against the Chinese.

The Chinese were forced to pay a big indemnity to Japan, but they had to borrow the money abroad.

The British induced the Japanese to take a good bit of it in the form of naval armaments and other munitions.

Japan was taken into partnership with Britain and other powers in the exploitation of China.

Then in 1902 the British concluded a formal alliance with Japan, with the specific purpose of encouraging the Japanese to make war against Russia.

How does it happen that we are now at war with Japan? To most Americans the reason is simply Pearl Harbor. But every American who reads the Roberts Commission Report on Pearl Harbor knows that the Japanese attack there did not come as a surprise to Washington. For the War Department, the Navy Department, and the Department of Military Intelligence had all notified their subordinates at Hawaii on November 27 that negotiations with Japan had ended and that an attack was to be expected at any time, but that we must not make the first overt act.

Remembering that many opponents of war were swept into approval of America's war with Japan by what they were led to regard as a brutal, unprovoked, and so inexcusable and treacherous attack by Japan, we wonder just what apprehension of this new aspect of affairs will do to their thinking. In particular we wonder just how it would affect the thinking of Dr. Morrison of the Christian Century, who came down on the side of war approval on the morrow of Pearl Harbor on the ground that it was his nation and his President, and therefore his war. Does that now imply approval of the process by which Japan was induced to make the first overt act of war? Does it imply agreement with Westbrooke Pegler in the Kansas City Star, as quoted by a correspondent in the Christian Century of December 31, '41?

We all know that most of the arguments that the America First crowd used against the President were true. He puts us into war by evading the Constitution, and his promises that American boys would not be sent to a foreign war were campaign trickery to get himself elected. But we may thank him for it now, and be glad he tricked us into a great advantage which otherwise have been lost.

Those of us with memories of the last war and its aftermath of disillusionment knew, even in those black days when it seemed as tho' militarists had now the best case war-makers have ever had, that within a few years of the close of this war, we would discover significant differences between what we had been told to get us to approve of this war and the actual facts as they became known. We hardly expected that the truth would begin to come out even before this war is over.

I have declared that if this war were to justify itself as the proper and effective response to diabolic evil, I would be obliged to repudiate Jesus Christ as demonstrably mistaken. At the same time I affirmed my confidence that I would never have to repudiate Jesus. I suggested that in ten years or so after the end of this war we might be in a position to decide whether it had, or had not, justified itself.

I now know with complete certainty that this war can never justify itself, either in the story of its beginnings, or in the tale of its results.

The intention of this commentary is partly to do a job of continued fundamental thinking into what is involved in a pacifist conviction, partly to grapple with criticisms of that conviction, and partly to comment on current events as they relate to it.

We have expressed the feeling that disillusionment, which we expected to arrive within ten years or so of the end of the war, is already at work and its results beginning to appear. Those we mention are, we believe, typical of others. In each case, while the disillusion has not gone to the length of the justification or avowal of the pacifist rejection of war, we feel that it does tend to justify the pacifist contention from the beginning, that war is inherently and inescapably futile, and cannot possibly bring about the idealist ends and aims claimed for it, but on the contrary cannot fail to create immense additional evil, at a cost far higher than would be likely in any sacrificial pacifist technique.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Comrade Aldred,—The Duke of Bedford's reply to my query confirms the impression that he had misinterpreted the statistics he quoted in "The Word" for April. He said, for example, that in "1927 and 1928, Australian factories produced 416 million pounds worth of goods, but distributed only 130 million pounds in wages, salaries and dividends," and proceeded to argue as though these were total figures for production and incomes in Australia. This they could not be since the population of Australia is 7,000,000 and the income per head would have been just over £9 per annum.

We must assume, therefore, that the figures given are for CERTAIN SELECTED FACTORIES or industries, although the Duke does not explain this point and continues to argue in his reply as though the figures were for the whole country. I was interested because to my knowledge, no estimate of total value of production and incomes for any country has so far been attempted or is even likely to be attempted. The reason for the difference between the 416 millions and the 130 millions now becomes clear. It is the amount disbursed for fuel, power, raw materials, transport, partly finished goods, replacement of machinery and ancillary services by the factories in question. The whole of the difference of 286 millions is thus eventually distributed as wages, salaries or profits through a chain of firms and can be spent in buying the whole product.

This is not a defence of Capitalism. Often the purchasing power is in the wrong hands. Often factories are closed down, although the LOWER INCOME groups are in dire need of their product. The purchasing power distributed to THE POORER CLASSES does not approach the NEED to consume of the poorer classes. But arguments like the one examined above are used by "Social Creditors" to attempt to show that Socialism is unnecessary and that by juggling with the issue of money, well-being for all can be secured and still retain the parasitical owner of capital in full control of industry; to try to prove that it is unnecessary to change the basic motive of industry from the pursuit of maximum dividends to the production of maximum real wealth for distribution according to need.

...I will only touch on one other point in his reply to me in the May issue. The Duke puts forward one of the favourite Social Credit arguments in a curious form. He says "during any given period, more money is being collected, through prices, and put into depreciation funds for prospective renewals of worn-out funds for current renewals." How on earth can he prove that? At times there will be more money being PAID OUT in renewing plant than is being put into depreciation funds, because the depreciation fund has been allowed to accumulate for just such a big expenditure.

I regret to find myself again disagreeing with the Duke for the simple reason that there is so much in his activities for me to admire. His fearless anti-militarism, his trenchant attacks on secret diplomacy, and his no less powerful exposures of financial rackets, for example, his exposure of the British bond-holders' rake-off from the Greek National Debt, kindle my admiration and claim my support.—Yours fraternally,

J. L. CRAIG.

HUMANIST FRIENDS' PROGRESS

By LOWELL H. COATE, M.A., Ph.D.

(Superintendent, the Humanist Society of Friends, U.S.A.)

[The following article is reproduced from "The Humanist Friend," Annual Number, 1945, published in Los Angeles, California, U.S.A.]

1944 was a year of definite advance for Humanist Friends despite the preoccupation of most people's minds with the war and numerous matters associated with the defense activities. In addition to the consolidation of our gains as a Society by having become officially and legally established with the various state and federal departments of the Government, we have also been able to expand numerically, particularly in the British Isles and in Australia and New Zealand, where our new Superintendents are demonstrating exceptional efficiency in their respective fields as well as exhibiting a superior knowledge of the movement and its opportunties by the excellent techniques which they employ in their official capacity and activities.

THE BRITISH ISLES

Particularly note-worthy has been the progress and achievements of Dr. Guy A. Aldred, Superintendent of the British Isles, with headquarters at 104 George Street, Glasgow, Scotland. In addition to his services in the defence of civil liberties in war-time and as Editor and publisher of THE WORD, a monthly magazine which circulates throughout the English-speaking world, Dr. Aldred has found the time and energy to bring within the Humanist Friends' fellowship two outstanding Unitarian Ministers together with their fine, strong congregations at Manchester and Portsmouth, respectively. Dr. Micklewright, Minister of the historic Manchester congregation, is well known to many Americans because of his frequent articles which appear in our Humanist publications in this country, as well as his books, which circulate freely among the liberal reading public. Rev. Charles H. Cole, a native of New Zealand, and a well-known pacifist, has remained steadfast to his principles in the face of strong opposition, but retains the confidence and support of his loyal friends and congregation. We bespeak great success for both.

I desire to take this opportunity to suggest that all Humanists become acquainted with Dr. Aldred's splendid work by subscribing to his magazine, THE WORD, at only $1 a year. This will enable American Humanists to keep in close touch with the various interesting activities and developments of our good Humanist cousins in the British Isles. In addition to the Humanist Ministers already mentioned, the principle and most regular contributor to Dr. Aldred's magazine is the Duke of Bedford, one of the youngest and most liberal members of the British House of Lords, who is also now an Ordained Minister of the Humanist Society of Friends, of whom we are all justly proud. Congratulations, Dr. Aldred, for the splendid work you are doing both as Superintendent of the Society and as Editor of that challenging Magazine. As we Americans are fond of saying: "More power to you!"

AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Mr. A. Hall Skelton, prominent attorney and leading Rationalist of Auckland, New Zealand, is Superintendent, and has taken the necessary legal steps to have the Society officially established there, and reports a lively interest and good progress.

Rev. W. Bottomly is both the Humanist Friends' Superintendent of Australia and Minister of the Unitarian Church in Melbourne. He also edits and publishes a monthly magazine of wide circulation, copies of which we always enjoy reading. We anticipate a fine future for Humanism in Australia under the leadership of Rev. Bottomly.

Dr. Sherman D. Wakefield, of New York City, has recently conducted an original and outstanding work of research, the results of which appear in his remarkable article in this first issue of "The Humanist World" magazine, titled "Humanists in History." Dr. Wakefield deserves the enthusiastic gratitude of all Humanists everywhere for this timely and significant contribution to Humanist History, for certainly no one can read the names of these great "Humanists in History" without feeling a keen sense of pride in being a Humanist.

In fact, we herewith nominate Dr. Wakefield as official Historian for the Humanist movement. Perhaps later he may be persuaded to prepare a similar list of "Contemparary Humanist." Meantime his "Humanist in History" is being reprinted in pamphlet form, copies of which are available at 10c each or 12 for $1.00, at the office of the Humanist World, 2405 West 23rd Street, Los Angeles 16, California.

The past year has been one of exceptional and significant activity on the part of several of our Humanist Friends officials and leaders. Dr. Hugh E. Macbeth has done outstanding work in connection with his efforts towards interracial co-operation both as Director of that Department in the Humanist Friends Society and under the auspices of the "United Races of America," of which he is President and Founder. He made two trips to Washington, D.C., and two visits to Mexico City, where he and a party of about 40 Humanists, were guests of President Camacho at the opening of the Mexican Congress in September. Hugh E. Macbeth, Jr., accompanied his father on another visit to Mexico where they planned and discussed an extensive educational Humanist programme for Mexico in connection with the University there. They brought back enthusiastic reports of progress and future prospects for Humanism in Mexico. Hugh, Jr., has recently returned to his home in Los Angeles from the University of California at Berkeley, where he spent three years as a law student and enjoyed living and conducting Humanist meetings in the great International House, where students of many different nations and races reside in beautiful, peaceful and harmonious co-operation.

Mr. Earl R. Card, Treasurer of the Society, and Mrs. Card, were among the large party of guests of President Camacho.

Here at home in California two fine groups of Humanist Friends have continued consistently regular programmes both in Los Angeles and in Hollywood. Eric Marlor and Frank Card have conducted Humanist meetings regularly every second and fourth Sunday of each month, and Dr. James C. Coleman, Jr., and William McClarty have conducted meetings every Sunday evening at the Unitarian Church Parlors, with a special Humanist Friends' programme every third Sunday of each month. These meetings have been of unusual interest, especially the two different occasions when Chief Pharmacist Mate Barney Taylor, previously on the Hospital Ship Utah when she was bombed up-side-down in Pearl Harbour, and later U.S. District Health Officer of one of the Samoan Islands, told of his many interesting experiences and of how he made Humanists of several thousands of natives of those Islands, in recognition of which he was unanimously elected Humanist Minister in charge of the Islands in the Pacific, where his work and activities chiefly centre. We anticipate further interesting and successful achievements by Chief Taylor.

Others here in California have been occupied with numerous Humanistic services, Dr. J. C. Coleman, General Superintendent, has combined ranching and writing. Dr. Edward McLarty, Vice-President of the Board of Trustees, has been unusually active throughout Los Angeles County as an official Health Officer, thus saving many lives by scientific humanistic methods.

Professor Harold L. Orr, Secretary of the Board, continues his busy life in charge of the Commercial Department at Edison Junior High School, and as President of the American Teachers' Federation in the Los Angeles district. He has built it into a strong, live, successful organisation—one of the best in the country.

Dr. D. Herbert Heywood has the honour and distinction of having his new book, "Personal Development," published in the midst of the busy war period. Congratulations, Dr. Heywood!

As Chairman of the Board of Trustees I have been rather more pre-occupied than usual with the multiplicity of duties imposed upon me as an educator both with the Los Angeles City School System and with the new Pacific International University, which was formerly known as Chapman College. This is one of the most remarkable and significant developments in education of modern times and will doubtless exercise a world-wide influence on education throughout many years to come.

THE PUNISHMENT OF WAR CRIMINALS

By DOROTHY HUTCHISON

At the beginning of this war Prime Minister Churchill said, "We have no desire to humiliate, crush, or defeat the German nation. Peace to be lasting, must result from the agreement of all, and not from the dictation of a few nations." And at the time when the United States entered the war, President Roosevelt said, "In victory we shall not seek vengeance but the establishment of an international order in which the spirit of Christ shall rule the heart of men and nations." Yet now these promises of a peace free from humiliation and vengeance have given place to the Yalta agreement which proposes for Germany territorial dismemberment, extensive deindustrialisation and payment of reparations in kind, long term occupation by conquering armies, and punishment for all individual Germans responsible for war crimes.

As the moment approaches for these punishments to be administered, it is imperative that the United Nations citizenry think through this practically and morally complex problem. We must ask ourselves how many of these punishments of the Germans are right, wise, and necessary for the future safety of the world. And just where is the line between the accepted procedures of war and war crimes? Who are the war criminals? And what practically effective and morally justifiable means are at hand for punishing them?

To many it appears that starting a war is the great crime overshadowing all others and that the German and Japanese nations are therefore the war criminals and must be punished en masse. But let us examine the practicability of the devices proposed for the punishment of Germany. Territorial dismemberment is recommended as a humiliating punishment which would also give compensation to Germany's neighbours who have suffered from her aggressions. But lopping off the Ruhr and Silesia would deprive Germany of more than 90 per cent. of her coal supply on which her steel, oil, and textile industries depend. According to the London Economist, this alone would transform many of the great cities of central Germany into places of "mass unemployment, mass undernourishment and perpetual political tension." And the Economist adds, "Can this really be called a recipe for peace?" Moreover, the psychological effect of dismemberment will hardly be the strengthening of internationalism in Germany, which is what we want, but rather the intensification of nationalism such as that demonstrated by Poland after her various partitions.

Deindustrialization is urged, not only as a punitive measure, but as a necessary safeguard against the secret rearming of Germany. But can we blame this war on secret rearming? Long before the war the whole world knew that Germany was rearming. The Germans bought much of their new military equipment from French and British firms and invited prominent Britons and Americans to inspect their magnificent air force, while we all congratulated ourselves that these armaments were a valuable protection against Russia. The fact is that no nation can arm secretly for modern warfare. A small international inspection commission with access to the import figures and the industrial plants of all nations could discern any rearmament program in embryo.

So the deindustrialization of Germany is not necessary for the world's protection but it certainly would be a drastic punishment. It is estimated that half of Germany's present population could not maintain life in a deindustrialized Germany. Moreover, the deindustrialization of Germany would work a terrible hardship on all of Europe of which Germany has long been the industrial hub. The supplementary plan of exporting German slaves by the millions to Russia and elsewhere might relieve unemployment in Germany but would pauperize their dependents left behind, would cause economic dislocations in the countries to which these slaves were sent, and would be open to all the terrible abuses which attend any system of slavery—a system which the civilized world long ago repudiated in principle.

Long-term military occupation of Germany by the conquering armies is hardly necessary for the world's safety. A small international police force, kept informed by the international inspection commission mentioned above, and authorized only to arrest and bring to trial guilty individuals of all nations who break treaty obligations, would be better peace insurance than would armies of occupation because it would not inspire the antagonism which the mere presence of foreign armies inevitably engenders and it could act against war fomentors everywhere — in United as well as Axis nations. Long term occupation is open to obvious abuses but, even if it were administered perfectly in the interests of Germany herself, i.e., for establishing order and a democratically elected government, it would tend to block German reeducation for democracy, which is one of our professed objectives. Resentment is poor soil for the germination of democratic ideas. Germans, like everyone else, learn more from the example and experience of democracy than from ideas forced down their throats by bayonet. And no democratic government in Germany could long survive as a United Nations puppet for the administration of a punitive peace.

The threat of any or all of these punishments has undoubtedly prolonged the war in Europe. When Goebbels said to the Germans, "It is certain that we would have only hell on earth to expect if we were to lay down our arms," and backed it up with the details of our official and semi-official plans, is it surprising that the Germans fought on like fiends?

In the last analysis, the crime of which the Germans were guilty in preparing for and fighting this war is the crime of putting devotion to nation above devotion to humanity and moral law, a crime of which all nations are to some extent guilty when they make either offensive or defensive war. And though Germany's guilt is great, is not her just punishment inherent in the war itself? Political chaos, economic ruin, devastation, disillusionment, and the collapse of morale which follows defeat! Are we morally obligated to devise punishments to add to these?

Maybe it is neither practically nor morally justifiable to punish a whole people but what about the Nazis who have committed known crimes? Here, too, certain problems present themselves.

We can hardly condemn army leaders for fighting a war as efficiently as possible by whatever means for have not we used mass starvation, obliteration bombing, and flame throwers in the name of military necessity? War is war and crimes against humanity are its stock in trade. Even if we draw a more or less arbitrary line and say that the use of certain instruments, such as the robot bomb, is a crime, who are the criminals? The soldier who released the bomb under order? The military official who ordered its manufacture and use because he was persuaded that it would shorten the road to his nations' victory? The industrialist who manufactured it as his duty in supporting the war effort? The scientist who invented it to serve his country's military need? Every one of these may have prostituted his conscience at the behest of the State but was not every one of them a patriot in the sense in which we, too, use that term?

But what about the atrocities, the expressions of pure sadism like Lidice and the death camps? Here again whom shall we punish? Unless we know where the orders originated, we shall allow the great criminals to escape and punish only the lesser criminals whose crime consisted in obeying orders which they knew to be morally wrong but which they believed themselves morally obligated to obey.

However, for the sake of argument, let us assume the impossible, i.e., that we can objectively decide what instruments and acts of war are "illegal" and that we have an accurate list of the Germans morally responsible for war crimes. It has been estimated that there will be in the neighbourhood of 50,000 of these war criminals.

Millions of Germans have suffered more than anyone else at the hands of these Nazis during the past twelve years and will want to punish them. The chances are that the Germans, if left to their own devices, would deal with their Nazi terrorists quite as sternly as we. But, if we insist upon taking this task of punishment, imagine the manhunt upon which we are launching. The 50,000 would scarcely be human, if they did not try to escape. And can we expect their fellow-Germans, even those who have suffered cruelly under the Nazi tyranny, to help us bring these hunted men to justice? Does the farmer, even though his hen coop has been robbed, betray the panting fox, which limps into his woodshed pursued by huntsmen and hounds in full cry? How much less would one betray a blood brother (even a guilty one) pursued by a foreign army! Before long our manhunt will involve millions of Germans who have aided the original criminals to evade justice, and we shall probably have either to retire ingloriously or else organise a reign of terror beside which Lidice will pale into insignificance.

We are told that, if the Nazis are permitted to survive, they will plot future war. But even if every Nazi is slaughtered, someone will arise to plot and lead a program for German revenge unless Germany is promptly rehabilitated as a prosperous and self-respecting nation. Our best strategy is, therefore, to help restore Germany to such economic, political, and phychological health as will deprive plotters of a following among the German people.

Is it necessary or useful to make martyrs of Germany's unsuccessful Nazi politicians? People repudiate leaders whose glowing promises have resulted only in disaster unless these leaders are martyred for their failures. Making martyrs of the Nazis may only delay the awakening of the Germans to the weaknesses of their ideology and program.

The price of each of the punishments proposed for Germany and individual Germans seems to be out of all proportion to its practical value as peace insurance. And the result, in every instance, threatens to be the delay, rather than the acceleration of Germany's becoming a genuinely peaceable member of the family of nations.

Instead of condemning any or all Germans to annihilation, humiliation, poverty or frustration, let us give them the practical help in reconstruction which will strengthen the hands of democratic elements inside Germany; let us open to them economic opportunities the lack of which was one of the major causes of this war; let us minister to their self-respect by welcoming them into an international organisation for the welfare of all nations, including themselves. The sin of aggressiveness becomes the virtue of enterprise, when it is channeled into constructive rather than destructive action. And the best protection against future military aggression by Germany is to free German enterprise for co-operation in the unprecedented task of reconstruction which the world now faces and to let Germany share as an equal in the prosperity which shall accrue from our common effort.
